From the editor's desk

'Do not stand idly by'

Last week I excerpted a number of small offerings of writings from some of the many periodicals that I receive each week.

In this column, I shall write about a book which recently came across my desk. Its author is one of the outstanding personalities of modern Jewish life, who combines a tangible, practical love for his Judaism with an equally tangible, practical love for his fellow human beings. Its subject is one of the most painful yet one of the least discussed in Jewish life. I am referring to The Shame Borne in Silence: Spouse Abuse in The Jewish Community by Rabbi Abraham J. Twerski, M.D., (Mirkov Publications, Inc., Pittsburgh).

Rabbi Twerski, a psychiatrist, is the founder and medical director of Gateway Rehabilitation Centre, a not-for-profit drug and alcohol treatment system in western Pennsylvania. He is renowned for his work in the addiction treatment and self-esteem restoration field. Gateway is considered by experts to be among the very best drug and alcohol treatment centres in North America.

Rabbi Twerski is a prolific writer; Shame is his 22nd book. He is also a prolific doer. His most recent health-related project is the establishment of a rehabilitation centre in Jerusalem, Shaar Hatikvah.

There are very few people, if any, with better credentials to write on the very difficult subject of spousal abuse in the Jewish world.

Like all works that deal with the heartache and the heartbreak of the human condition, this is a distressing book to read. Rabbi Twerski writes with a professional's attention to detail, comprehensive but not lurid. The result is an illuminating candor and a compelling sense of urgency.

One of the chief hallmarks of the manner in which Rabbi Twerski "speaks" to the reader is the way in which he seamlessly stitches Torah and Halachah into the fabric of his medical judgments. This is evident from the very first pages of the book. For example, in his introduction, Rabbi Twerski explains why he undertook to write on the subject of spouse abuse.

"I began to be haunted by the concept of 'Do not stand idly by while your neighbor's blood is being spilled' (Leviticus 19:16), which the Talmud interprets to mean that one has an obligation to divert harm from coming to another person. When staffs of social agencies told me that their efforts to alert the Jewish community to the problem of spouse abuse were being ignored, and that I should address the problem,...I began to feel uneasy at remaining silent. Someone then pointed out to me that the Talmud says that anyone who has the ability to correct a situation and is derelict in doing so, bears the responsibility for whatever results therefrom (Shabbat 54b). I realized that I have no option, and that I must speak out."

Rabbi Twerski deals with the argument often raised by well-meaning individuals that these sorts of problems should not be discussed openly.

"There will be those who will say that such subjects should not be aired publicly, and that to do so is a chilul HaShem, a disgrace to the sanctity of Judaism, to even imply that Jewish husbands can be wife batterers. I understand that position, but if I must choose between being reprimanded by those who believe that this problem should be concealed, or a wife who has suffered (along with her children) from an abusive husband and could not receive help because no one believed her, I know where I must make my choice."

Speaking as a health care professional determined to maintain the highest possible standards of caregiving, and not "merely" as a concerned individual, he further explains the underlying justification for publicly airing the problems of spouse abuse in the Jewish community.

"Unless we understand the problems of spouse abuse, we may unwittingly give bad advice to our children, our friends, our clients and our parishioners. This book is intended to provide insights into the problem for actual cases, as well as several observations on Torah values and an overview of what the conditions are in society that must be considered when dealing with spouse abuse."

The rule of life by which Rabbi Twerski lives, both as a private person and as a professional, is: "Do not stand idly by."

It is an approach urged upon us by our religion and our traditions, by conscience and morality and, quite literally, by the crying needs of many of the people with whom we share our community.

For their sake and for ours, we should strive to incorporate that approach into our lives.

An easy way to start is by reading Rabbi Twerski's book. MBD

Lawyer slams Swiss banks

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Australian lawyer who has filed successful appeals against banks in Switzerland claims that the Zurich-based Swiss Bankers Association (SBA) is toying with Jews claiming dormant funds.

Henry Burstyner charged in an interview that the SBA, whose mandate is to mediate disputes between Swiss banks and their clients, is essentially engaged in a "public relations exercise" designed to appease world and Jewish opinion.

Burstyner further charged that Hanspeter Hani, the SBA's ombudsman, is powerless to help Jewish petitioners who believe they are heirs to unclaimed dormant assets.

He called Hani, an employee of the Swiss Banking Ombudsman Foundation,"a very honest man with integrity.

"But he has no teeth," added Burstyner, a partner with the firm of Glennen Burstyner & Company in Victoria, Australia.

"He hasn't been given any power, though he implies he has some influence and power. His sole function is to appease and delay."

Moreover, Burstyner said, Hani is neither independent nor neutral.

Last November, in his first report as ombudsman, Hani said that Swiss banks held $1.6 million in dormant accounts, of which $11,000 could be traced to several Jewish depositors.

The World Jewish Congress, which is leading an international campaign to cajole Swiss banks to settle the claims of Jewish depositors and their descendants and relatives, described it a "pathetic amount."

Last week, Hani released his much-awaited second report on dormant accounts. He said that Swiss banks had uncovered $16.8 million, of which $9.8 million belonged to victims of the Holocaust.

In a critique of the SBA, Burstyner said its role is exceedingly limited. "All it does is to relay claims to the relevant banks. And if a claimant doesn't have concrete information, then Hani's office is damn useless."

Burstyner said the SBA is at a disadvantage in handling petitioners' claims because only about half of the banks in Switzerland are members of its organization.

Burstyner warned prospective claimants who plan to deal with the SBA that they may have to spend as much as $3,000 to pursue a claim to the end.

Criticizing the Swiss banking system, he said that dormant assets should be stored in a special government fund rather than in Swiss banks. And branches of identical Swiss banks should have access to information about each other's accounts.

Relating his own activities on behalf of clients in Australia, Burstyner said he and Swiss lawyers had "retrieved" about 250,000 Swiss francs (approximately $250,000) for the families of two Holocaust survivors in Melbourne and Sydney.

"It took a couple of years and three visits to Switzerland," said Burstyner, who dealt directly with the banks rather than with the SBA.

His clients had documentary evidence to support their claims, he observed.

Currently, he and Swiss colleagues are working for 14 Austrian clients, originally from Europe, who have put in claims for dormant funds.

Burstyner said he intends to doggedly pursue Swiss banks "until they have disgorged all their illicit gains. They should not be allowed to profit from the victims of the Holocaust.

"The more lawyers there are like me in the world to expose the Swiss, the better."

Burstyner has affiliate offices outside Australia: one in London, England, and another in Montreal.

Mazon makes pitch for donors' tax rebates

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The founder of Mazon Canada is asking members of the Ontario Jewish community to direct their provincial tax rebates to organizations addressing child poverty and hunger.

Writing in Mazonews, the organization's newsletter, Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld said such a contribution to Mazon Canada or the United Way "could help make life more tolerable for the 1.5 million children whose families subsist below the poverty line. Instead of feeling helpless, we want to become partners in a process of providing greater social decency and stability for Canada because these values are in everyone's interest, rich and poor, liberal and conservative, religious and secular."

The pitch comes at a time when Ontario's Conservative government has come under fire for reducing social welfare payments while promising to cut taxes.

The fundraising effort is "a way of addressing an issue that transcends political, social and economic categories in a manner that places the initiative squarely in the laps of those who have the greatest stake in remedying this national tragedy — us...I believe these actions will make a difference. And even if we don't succeed in dramatically changing our society, we could prevent our society from changing us," Rabbi Bielfeld wrote.

Jacqueline Kott-Wolle

To date, the rabbi's congregation at Temple Emanu-El has raised about $10,000, said Jacqueline Kott-Wolle, executive-director of Mazon Canada.

Over the course of its 10-year history, the organization has racked up success after success. This year it set a new record for spring allocation totals to food banks and other groups fighting hunger.

Kott-Wolle reported that Mazon, which bills itself as "a Jewish response to hunger," allocated $112,000 in the spring of 1997, bringing Mazon's total since its creation in 1987 to $1,112,530. The spring totals represent continuation of a trend, with only one brief blip to mar the way, of regular increases in the funds Mazon distributes. In 1996, Mazon set a new annual record, allocating $228,480.

Among the recipients of Mazon's spring allocations are: Bikur Cholim of Toronto ($4,000); Cranbrook Food Bank Society, British Columbia ($1,250); Dundas County food Bank, Winchester, Ont. ($1,500); and Kosher Senior Wheels to Meals Project, Vancouver, B.C. ($1,750).

Kott-Wolle views its spring totals as a "bittersweet" success. "It reflects a growing need and that the community is responding to the need," she said.

Kott-Wolle, who took over as executive-director in February, said she plans to introduce several new programs to raise funds and increase Mazon's community profile.

Mazon recently established a speaker's bureau consisting of Kott-Wolle, members of the Mazon board and other volunteers who will discuss the issue of child poverty and hunger in Canada.

Kott-Wolle, who owns a small hand-painted ceramics business, is planning a poster contest for teens in Jewish schools. They will be asked to produce a poster illustrating the issues of hunger, poverty and the Jewish value of tzedakah. The "art as politics" poster will be used as part of Mazon's promotional material, she said.

Also on tap is a food fest modeled on the successful food shows developed by Mazon's Montreal branch. Since 1995, kosher caterers in Montreal have hosted a cocktail party during which they showcase their wares to the community. Tickets to the event sell for $50, with a $25 tax receipt being issued. Mazon is recipient of the full amount raised.

The food fest has proven immensely popular, with 800 attending the last event, Kott-Wolle said.

Outdoor Yiddish concert draws 2,000

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Making an impassioned plea to save the Yiddish language "before it is too late," Ethel Cooper said from $60,000 to $70,000 will be spent in the next year to promote Yiddish culture.

"Yiddish is the foundation of our Askenazi culture," the new chair of the UJA Federation's Yiddish committee, told a crowd of 2,000 attending the 15th annual Yiddish outdoor concert in Earl Bales Park.

The huge audience, lugging lawn chairs and blankets, were treated to a rousing concert celebrating the work of composer Avraham Goldfadden, presented by, among others, singers Stella Walker, Gloria Valentine and Michael Mandel, backed up by the Chutzpah Klezmer Band and piano accompanist Sageev Oore.

They heard such favorites as Oygn, Ich Zing, Ven du Lachst, Yidl Mitn Fidl and the irrepressible Rumania, Rumania. Later, the ever-popular Shloimele-Malke, Shvigaro, Farges Mich Nit, Tif vi di Nacht, Grine Kusine, Rhohzhinkes and Abi Gezunt were performed.

Cheers greeted Mayor Mel Lastman's announcement that "there will be no golf in Earl Bales Park. We took the money out of the budget so it's over." (The Metro Parks Commission had wanted to build an 18-hole golf course in the park to raise revenue.)

"You don't need a cottage, you just need Earl Bales Park," Lastman told the audience, which included many seniors who live in nearby apartment buildings.

As usual, Lastman told a joke in his fractured Yiddish, the same one he told two years ago, but it still got a laugh.

The City of North York was a co-sponsor of the concert.

Master of ceremonies David Abramowitz joined in the fun. As the night turned somewhat cold, he appealed, at the microphone, "to whoever is up there, you can turn off the air conditioning."

Cyrel Troster brought greetings from UJA Federation.

It was not a new story; that is why it hurt even more. Statistics Canada released a report on poverty in Canada, which disclosed that during a two-year period of study, approximately 2.3 million Canadians lived below a designated low-income cutoff line.

As reported in the Globe and Mail, about 16 percent of Canadians were below the low-income cutoff at some point in the two years. Included in these numbers is the jarring and distressing truth that nearly one-quarter, 22 percent, of all Canadian children under the age of six were being raised in poverty at some point in the two years examined, and, that 13 percent of children under the age of six were being raised in poverty for both of those years.

Whatever our differing individual views of government's role in the alleviation of poverty or of the public policies that should be implemented that are most effective towards its remedy, it is beyond debate that the situation is intolerable and unjustifiable in a land and in a society as wealthy as ours.

We must not be indifferent to these statistics. They are alarming numbers. If we were to "paint" by them, they would depict a doleful picture of darkness, despair, self-doubt and stress for millions of our fellow Canadians.

Increasingly, Canadians are not simply waiting for the government to step in. There is the laudatory example of the Temple Emanu-El Congregation in Toronto, which, under the leadership of Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld is spearheading a campaign to persuade individuals to direct provincial tax rebates to organizations that attempt to fight child poverty and hunger. We agree with Rabbi Bielfeld when he recently wrote: "Instead of being helpless, we want to become partners in a process of providing greater social decency and stability for Canada because these values are in everyone's interest, rich and poor, liberal and conservative, religious and secular."

The thoughtful and creative social action initiative of Temple Emanu-El is to be praised. We can each learn a valuable lesson from them. But so should the various levels of government in this country learn that lesson as well. Individual initiative does not replace governmental obligation.

Silence pierced

The attempt last week by NATO forces to arrest four individuals suspected of having committed crimes against humanity during the civil war and break up of the former Yugoslavia is to be commended. The operation resulted in the capture of three of the suspects and the killing of Simo Drljaca, who resisted his captors.

Drljaca, the former police chief of the city of Prijedor, ran the concentration camp at Omarska, where thousands of people were killed, where unspeakable atrocities were committed and where distant echoes of the pitiful screams of human suffering more than a half century earlier slammed against the walls of western silence.

With these arrests that silence has now been pierced.

The capture of these men was an act of conscience, an affirmation of the highest value and moral principle of human existence that each and every life is unique and possessed of inherent dignity. Nothing and no one can be allowed to compromise that principle. We await further actions against the suspected war criminals still at large, though now perhaps cowering, in their hiding holes.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"The life of the western Jew is no longer endangered through the enmity of the mob; but bodily wounds are not the only wounds that cause pain, and from which one may bleed to death."

The Sassoons and Kadoories in Hong Kong

Re: The Jewish community in Hong Kong (CJN, June 26).

Please note that none of the families named in your article are from Persia or Iran. The latter all came in the 17th and early 18th century from Baghdad. For a while, the Sassoons, the Kadoories and their many employees married brides from Baghdad and kept Iraqi traditions. The key positions in their empire were always held by Iraqi Jews brought specifically from Baghdad for the purpose.

Iraq and Iran, although neighbors, don't speak the same language and are as different as let us say, British and German Jews.

I am of Iraqi origin, born in Persia, although I have lived in Montreal for the past 45 years.

Jewish population growing on West Island

Re: A new Orthodox congregation is organized in Dollard (CJN, June 13, Montreal edition).

There is an increased Jewish population in Pierrefonds, Kirkland, Beaconsfield, LaSalle, Verdun (including Nuns' Island), Lachine, Roxboro, Pointe Claire and Dorval. Each of these areas could support new synagogues, schools and institutions, as well as a new funeral chapel to serve the West Island.

Many Jews are secular, converts to Judaism, Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist, humanist. There is no reason why another congregation cannot be established. Not all individuals of the Jewish faith have cars and some are not able to drive long distances.

Jews in Switzerland's government

As a citizen of Switzerland, I would like to mention that at present there are three Jews in the Swiss government.

Sheldon Kirshner states in his articles that Francois Loeb is the only Jew in the Swiss government. Besides Loeb, Ruth Dreyfuss has been in the Swiss government for some years and has a good chance to become the first Jewish president of Switzerland.

While we were in Switzerland in the month of June, another Jewish lady, Ursula Koch, was elected as a member of the Swiss government, called Bundesraetin. She won handsomely over her Catholic male opponent through her charisma, as the Swiss newspapers reported.

Editors note: Kirshner wrote that Francois Loeb is the only Jewish member of the Federal Parliament.

Threats against Israeli artists

Last month, Irish pop star Sinead O'Connor bowed out of her scheduled Jerusalem appearance due to death threats.

For two years, I have been bringing Israeli acts to perform in Canada. These artists have told me of threats that have not been publicized for fear of copycats.

Israel has a diverse, rich and fascinating cultural scene and attracts talent from around the world to its festivals and performance venues. The appropriate reaction to an artist whose work one dislikes, or opinions one opposes, is to not attend their concerts. It is incumbent on our rabbis, community leaders and everyone with a conscience and a love of art to condemn this new level of intimidation that threatens to destroy Israeli culture and with it unravel the very fabric of Zionism.

No infant on front seat with air bag

The article "Properly installed safety seats save kid's lives" (CJN, May 8 Montreal edition), regarding the installation and use of child safety seats, contained erroneous advice which may in fact place infants at risk.

Your readers should be informed that according to a recent Transport Canada flyer, no child, including those in rear-facing infant seats, should ever be placed in the front seat of a vehicle equipped with a passenger side air bag.

Visit to father's village a bittersweet experience

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The last of a four part series

When I was growing up, Rubjevich was a mystical place where young people went to cheder, enjoyed winter sleigh rides, took produce to town in a horse-drawn wagon, raised pigeons that were brought to the shochet for slaughter and ate tzimmes from a large copper pot as a Shabbes midnight snack. Life was good in the tiny Polish village.

At least, that's the way my father, Ben, remembered his early years before World War II. His family was fairly prosperous and they enjoyed a comfortable life, with their own modern house, a barn, a garden and land stretching down to the river.

In 1939, Rubjevich was part of eastern Poland and when the Germans and Soviets split the country that year, my father's village was taken over by the Russians.

By the time fighting broke out between Germany and Russia in June 1941, my father had already been drafted into the Russian army. After adventures too numerous to recount, he eventually joined the partisans in the woods of northern Byelorussia. Half his immediate family – his mother, sister and brother – were killed by the Nazis and most of the town's Jews were rounded up and shot in the woods only a couple of kilometres from his home.

When my father returned to Rubjevich after the war, all that was left of his home, one of the newest and largest in town, was the foundation. Seeing his life in Rubjevich over, my father, left for Germany along with his father and brother. After several years in a displaced persons camp near Munich, he made it to Canada.

He often talked about his hometown and even corresponded with his cousin, Meir Shapiro, the only member of his family who survived the war in Rubjevich. But he never returned and I never thought seriously about visiting there.

But earlier this year, the opportunity to do so arose. And I went.

From Moscow where I had been on assignment, I took an overnight train to Minsk, the capital of Belarus (formerly Byelorussia), where a driver and interpreter, arranged through contacts in the Minsk Jewish community, met me. After greetings were exchanged, we embarked on the hour-long drive to Rubjevich, about 70 km southwest of Minsk.

It was Sunday morning and the roads were fairly deserted. The drive went quickly and easily. I had been warned that the roads in Belarus were poor and pock-marked, if paved at all, and that there might be bandits on the road laying in wait to rob us, if not worse. But the trip passed uneventfully though with plenty of anticipation at what lay ahead.

All I had to guide us at Rubjevich was a hand-drawn map of the village from a book of remembrance the town's Israel-based landsmen had published about 20 years ago, along with two names: Meir Shapiro, my father's cousin and Vladislav Radlinski, my father's neighbor. After Shapiro died several years ago, my father lost contact with his widow, Anna, and with his two sons, my second cousins. But my father believed they were still living in Rubjevich. I had never met them and knew virtually nothing about them.

We pulled in to Rubjevich around 10 in the morning. The road led into an open area, like a square, where people were waiting for a bus. Our interpreter and driver, who had already heard much of my family history, got to work trying to track down my father's old neighbor or my cousins.

As luck would have it, the neighbor's son, Stanislav, was walking through the square at that very moment. Yes, he acknowledged, his father was at home and he'd take us to see him. Hopping into the car, he guided us the 400 metres – halfway across town – to his home. What followed was like something out of a foreign film. I was ushered into the house and a buzz of excitement could be heard and felt as the Radlinskis chatted in Polish or Belarussian. There was food already on the table in preparation for the family's Sunday feast. Then Radlinski entered. Although he was about 10 years younger than my father, he looked about 10 years older. Life in the small town was clearly hard on him.

Although he had never heard of me, he greeted me like a long-lost relative. Over lunch and drinks, Radlinski expounded on the wartime history of the village. He didn't remember much about my father. It was actually his older brother who was my father's friend and who died serving in the same partisan unit as my father. But he did remember my grandfather and one of my father's cousins.

Even in a town as small as Rubjevich the Nazis established a ghetto, Radlinksi said, pointing "over there," out the window, towards my father's house. Then one day, all the Jews remaining in the town were rounded up, taken to the woods and shot, he said, as his children and grandchildren listened raptly.

After breakfast, his wife took us to see the site of my father's house, which had served as part of the ghetto in the 1940s. It was a grey, slushy day and we picked our way gingerly through the muck. Instead of a house, there stood a cinder-block storage room and behind it, on land that stretched down to a pretty river, there was a corrugated iron shed. No house, no barn, no garden.

When he saw the pictures I had taken, my father shook his head and remarked how little it resembled the place he remembered.

From there we went to the home of Anna Shapiro. The reception there was even warmer than at the Radlinskis. My presence was a complete surprise and at times, Anna became tongue-tied with excitement. Her son, Simeon, on the other hand, was quiet and serious, a Belarussian Gary Cooper. Together with his wife and three teenaged children, they live in the same home Meir Shapiro's father built in the 1930s. At the time, my father said, it was one of the largest and nicest homes in the town.

After the war, Meir had considered leaving the village but changed his mind at the last minute. He married Anna, a non-Jewish, Belarussian women and remained in Rubjevich until he died about 10 years ago.

Inside their living room, dominated by a picture of the Virgin Mary and a TV set that was always turned on, Anna reminisced. For her, the day was particularly emotional. I was the only relative from her husband's side of the family she'd seen in decades. I was the only relative from her husband's side of the family that her son and grandchildren had ever seen, she said.

Then, shooing us out of the house so she could prepare lunch, she instructed Simeon and Stanislav to take us on a tour of the town. As part of the visit, I was taken to the forest where the Nazis had shot the town's Jews. An impressive matzevah (memorial) rests on the spot. Survivors from Israel had erected the monument some years before.

Soon we returned to the Shapiro household. I excused myself to go to the washroom and was directed to an outhouse in the back yard. On my return, I washed up from a cylindrical water container that hung over the sink. Though Rubjevich had electricity, paved roads and TV, running water had yet to come to the village.

My interpreter, driver and I were treated to an impromptu Sunday meal based on whatever food was about. The table was laid out with sausage, potatoes, p'tcha, smoked Baltic sprats served on rye bread and sliced cucumbers.

As we sat over lunch, a bottle of vodka was brought out to toast the visit. The driver abstained, the interpreter declined, but I, not wishing to create an international incident, agreed to have just one, and then another one, and then perhaps one more for the road and another for the ditch. As I sat drinking with Anna, Simeon and his wife, the mood became more boisterous, the fellowship more hearty. We talked about our mutual relatives, a little about the old days, but frankly, I don't recall much of what we talked about, only that at the end of the day, the mood was bittersweet and that even the interpreter was moved by the reunion.

It was getting late in the day and, we could see the bottom of the bottle. We were still faced with a drive back to Minsk. It was time to say our goodbyes. We hugged and Anna invited me to return in the summer, "when swans glide on the river and the village is lush with greenery."

I thanked her for her hospitality and wished her and her family well. But I knew my visit was probably the last time I'd ever see my Belarussian relatives.

Opinions

Then on Sunday the rabbi retired

The rabbinical couple who has led our congregation for over 30 years will retire and make aliyah this fall. This milestone in our congregational life leads me to contemplate the role of the rabbi, indeed the role of a rabbinical family, in the life of a community.

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

My family was a clerical one. My father and grandfather were ordained ministers and another grandfather was a lay preacher (one who served rural congregations but had no ordination). I was a PK, a preacher's kid, and so I have some feeling for the situation of the rabbinical family.

A rabbinical family comes to a community that often views their lives as surrogates for everything members of the flock are not willing to do.

Kashrut? That's the rabbi's job. Shabbat? The rabbi's kids better not be caught playing baseball or watching TV, even at a neighbor's house.

Holidays? The rabbi's wife is expected to hold a continuing open house for people who have no place to go for a seder or Rosh Hashanah. As for the rabbi's children dating? Every appearance is scrutinized. School attendance and performance? A matter of public interest in the public domain.

Rabbinical families are expected, on the one hand, to lead in matters of spirituality and social conscience; on the other, to appear out of step with the congregation, which assumes its worldly concerns would not interest someone who communicates with God on a regular basis (often on their behalf). We want the rabbi there when we need him or her, but conveniently out of our faces when we are doing something that gives us a twinge of conscience.

Few can make the grade for over 30 years in one congregation, as ours has done. Let me tell you a little about this couple, so you can realize why.

On call, 24 hours a day: People do not time their needs. A child dies tragically; the rabbi is there, day or midnight. A widow has no one to see her pain; the rabbi sits with her daily until she feels she can go on. Jews are sent to prison, a place where they may be conveniently forgotten; our rabbi creates a regular routine for prison visits and special holiday events. These are daily acts of chesed, unsung lovingkindness, that shape a community.

In many ways there is nothing more individualistic than a rabbi, whose word is law. In large part as a result of the work of our rabbi, the rabbis of most congregations now meet regularly as RAV (Rabbinical Association of Vancouver).

Our congregation has been fortunate in having the kind of rabbinical couple that may be going out of style, where both partners are completely dedicated to the education of their community. In younger rabbinical families, the non-rabbinic partner may have his or her own career and want to pursue it without unrewarded responsibilities to a congregation.

In that regard, our community will lose a unique woman, even as Israel gains a valuable resource. She has taught adults for three decades in Bible, Talmud, Jewish living, history and a host of topics that bring beauty to Jewish life. In addition to all this, she has opened her home to thousands of guests from all over the Jewish world. It is from her that many of us learned the importance and beauty of kashrut, Shabbat and the thousand little things that make a Jewish family.

Above all, the humaneness of their Judaism stands in stark contrast to the brutality of the Judaism now advocated by a huge segment of so-called God-fearers in Israel. To our rabbi, every Jew is important, every Jew has a contribution to make to the whole of Jewish life, every Jew has a spark of the divine and can use that spark to illuminate the world. How ironic that this couple is going to an Israel intent on removing the "rabbi" from our rabbi's life.

For both of them, a major contribution has been the creation of the museum housed at our synagogue. Through the artifacts and exhibits of the museum, Jews and the wider community can learn about the lives of Jews throughout the world and across the ages.

"For the righteous person of a city is her glory, her splendor, and her beauty. When he departs, her glory, her splendor, and her beauty depart with him." (Bereshit Rabbah 68:6)

Two righteous people are leaving us. Our community is immeasurably richer because we have had them among us. We were blessed. They will be missed.

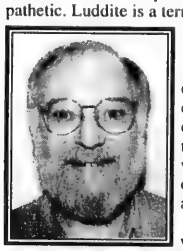
(Final of two parts)

Despite my apprehension about human reliance on Golems, I am not a Luddite, classic, post or neo. Just sympathetic. Luddite is a term commonly used to describe a person who resists technological change. The Luddites were a group of English craftsmen and laborers who were notorious between 1811 and 1816.



By Shel Krakofsky in London

The Luddites were threatened by new and innovative machinery and set out to destroy it. The name derives from one Ned Ludd, who may never have existed. Around 1779, he allegedly smashed two frames of a "stockinger" used to make stockings more efficiently and this, so legend has it, originated the machine breaking craze.

A wave of technological terrorism caught on during the Industrial Revolution. There were Luddites in the cotton and wool trades, in agriculture and deep in the mines of England. Their threatening letters to factory owners were cordially signed, "Yours truly, Ned Ludd." When apprehended, Luddites were deported. Some were also hanged, quite a conventional method of elimination.

In the United States, a chap by the name of Kirkpatrick Sale has founded a group called the "Neo-Luddites." Sale has written a book (presumably in longhand) called Rebels Against The Future, which proposes to eradicate all computers.

You may have read about Sale, who broke up an IBM personal computer with a sledgehammer on a stage in New York City. There was a cheering crowd of 1,500. To these people, one computer picture is not worth a thousand nerds.

Technology has invaded our privacy even as we cocoon in front of computers. Marshall McLuhan's ironic, oxymoronic contradiction in terms, the global village, is an electronic term and nothing more. There is indeed a global communications network today, but it certainly isn't bringing people together into any kind of village.

Since the Berlin Wall came down and the Soviet Union disintegrated, small countries have tried to become even smaller. Simmering ethnic and religious differences have percolated to the brim, resulting in blood baths around the globe. There may be the desire for a computerized global village, but in terms of tribal differences, the nations and peoples of the world want to contract, not expand.

The wired global village doesn't offer tranquillity and mutual respect. It actually guarantees discord and maximal disagreement. For evidence, simply look to Africa, the Balkans and Quebec as obvious examples.

Communications technology has created a dense distance, not only between peoples, but also between individuals. Human contact has become indirect and minimal as we isolate ourselves from one another with automated bank machines, voice mail and the other modern paraphernalia of human non-interaction.

We have become xenophobic because we refuse to encounter strangers directly. Even among friends using electronic communication crutches, we suffer from intentional social autism.

It is impossible to seal e-mail with anything. (Remember those lovely and innocent summer letters SWAK!) And if you choose the electronic route, scented letters can neither be sent or received. Fax and e-mail are freeze-dried transmissions.

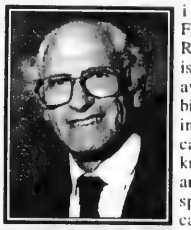
When Gershom Scholem, the late scholar of Jewish mysticism, was asked to dedicate the first sophisticated computer at the Weizmann Institute at Rehovot in 1965, he declared the most appropriate name for it would be Golem Aleph. In his remarks at the ceremony, Scholem said, "So I resign myself and say to the Golem (of Rehovot) and its creator: develop peacefully and don't destroy the world."

For all their useful work, computers and their gimmicky offspring have the frightening capacity to render unnecessary the very people they are meant to serve. And they afflict their data-driven devotees with "information fallout," that striking McLuhan phrase describing the masses of information that can never be absorbed.

So when you next start surfing the Net while another person sits alone or is being replaced by a computer, just remember, there but for the grace of a Golem go you.

Are books on way out?

For the last 35 years, an Israeli magazine has been one of my favorite readings. A quarterly called Ariel, it is an Israel review of arts and letters. Published in English, French, German, Russian and Spanish, it is now also available — in a biennial edition — in Arabic (just in case you want to know). One of the articles in the spring issue was called Click! And Ye Shall Find, an engaging piece by Shelley Kleiman. It deals with electronic publishing in Israel, and one of the early paragraphs sets the tone:



By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

"Israelis have always treasured an exalted image of themselves as voracious readers. While there are those who dispute this image — recent studies indicate that average Israelis spent half their leisure time in front of a television — Israel's conventional publishing industry is nonetheless one of the world's largest on a per capita basis. Reading levels have not appreciably declined over the past 20 years, despite the appeals of the mass media…Crowds still throng the stalls of the Annual Hebrew Book Week (which a few weeks ago took place in Jerusalem) and large numbers of young, talented writers surface on a regular basis."

The article then goes on to describe the explosion of the electronic media and with it, a revolution in bookmaking. The book of tomorrow, so it appears, will be a CD-ROM, which will make it unnecessary to buy some of the expensive encyclopedias and other source books.

But that, you will say, does not represent a diminution of reading, because instead of reading from pages of a book, one will read the text on a screen. So what's the difference?

The new CDs will be illustrated and also talk to you. They will respond to a click by the finger to questions, and answer them in a visual or written way — no research required, and by and by, reading will be overshadowed by images. No more handling of heavy tomes; no more trips to the library — and where does that leave people like me who spend their life writing books?

I am not quite sure, but I am also not afraid of tomorrow. No doubt the Internet will take over a good deal of it, and if the revolution that is now taking place is indeed as advertised, it will merely show that, 450 years after Gutenberg, the year 2000 will presage another new age in communication.

Of course, these prognostications are not undisputed. There are those who say that books as we know them will always be around, and possibly that is true. Fingering the pages of a book while sitting in your armchair is a pleasure that people will be loath to give up. But it is difficult to look into the future, and the only thing I know is that it will probably be different from what I think it will be.

TV has overshadowed radio — but it is radio that stimulates the imagination far more than TV ever does. Meanwhile, if you're interested in reading Ariel on the Internet, here is the address: [http://www.israel-fa.gov.il], and if you want to ask about Ariel on e-mail, write to: [ask@israel-info.gov.il].

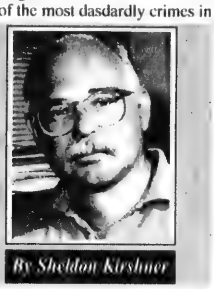
Bombings in Argentina remain unsolved

Two years ago, in this column, I observed that Argentina had failed to solve two of the most dasdardly crimes in its history — the bombing of the Israeli embassy on March 17, 1992 and the bombing of a Jewish community centre on July 18, 1994.



By Sheldan Kirshner

The first blast killed 29 people and wounded more than 100. The second, the worst anti-Semitic crime since the Holocaust, snuffed out 86 lives and injured hundreds.

Both attacks took place in Buenos Aires, the cosmopolitan city where the vast majority of Argentina's 200,000 Jews are concentrated.

In the wake of the second deadly explosion, President Carlos Saul Menem pledged he would spare no effort to track down the perpetrator(s). As of this week, however, the police have yet to turn up any useful leads, and the government remains lamentably clueless.

The government's inability to unravel the mysteries has aroused widespread indignation and anger. Ruben Beraja, a Jewish community leader, has criticized Menem for lacking a strategic plan, while Domingo Cavallo, the former finance minister, has expressed incredulity at the slowness of the investigations.

Theories about the possible culprits abound. In one of his earliest statements regarding the bombing of the community centre, Menem laid the blame at the doorstep of foreign terrorists aided and abetted by local accomplices. Juan Jose Galeano, the official who heads a judicial probe into the affair, suggested that Iran was at fault. Of late, he has revised his view, contending that American neo-Nazi groups may be behind the outrage.

Israel, for its part, believes that Hezbollah, a Lebanese group supported by Iran, is responsible for the twin bombings. Roberto Marquevitch, a judge who has opened a parallel probe of the crimes, has pointed an accusing finger at Argentinian neo-Nazis aligned with Hezbollah.

The strangest hypothesis about the Israeli embassy bombing is held by two justices of the Argentine Supreme Court, Adolfo Vazquez and Carlos Fayt. Several months ago, they suggested that Jewish extremists were in fact the perpetrators.

Not surprisingly, their theory has been treated with withering contempt. Carlos Corach, the Argentinian interior minister, dismissed it as "nonsense." The Latin American representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, Sergio Widder, fumed that the court was "trying to turn the victims into victimizers."

It's not the first time the Supreme Court has muddied the waters. Last August, it released a report claiming that the embassy was levelled by a bomb "placed inside the building" rather than by a car bomb, as government investigators and the Israeli ambassador, Yitzhak Aviran, believe.

In a statement, the Israeli Foreign Ministry categorically rejected the report, prompting Menem to order a new study on the 1992 bombing "to settle the issue" once and for all.

Against all odds, Argentine officials insist that the cases will be solved. "We are firmly convinced that no matter how much time has passed, the will to clear this up continues and is firm," said Corach, a Jew, recently.

We will see.

Corach faces more problems in the wake of Jewish community suspicions that members of the police were involved in the failed bombing of a Jewish hospital in Buenos Aires last November and in a series of Jewish cemetery desecrations throughout the country since last year.

Bowing to pressure, he established a special commission to study these incidents, which underscore the physical insecurity of Argentina's Jewish community, the largest in Latin America.

Argentina, as American scholar Robert Weisbrot has written, is a nation caught between its democratic traditions and its autocratic and xenophobic impulses. It has compiled a record of welcoming Jewish immigrants from Europe and the Middle East, but anti-Semitic violence and vandalism have proven to be endemic, Weisbrot, author of The Jews of Argentina, points out in a brief essay in The New Republic.

Swayed by Hitler

Thirty-five years after its publication, Alan Bullock's biography, Hitler: A Study in Tyranny, is still the standard work by which others are measured. By comparison, Ernst Hanfstaengl's book, Hitler, The Missing Years (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $16.95), is hardly in the same league. Nonetheless, Hanfstaengl's memoirs — which were originally published in 1957 and which have now been released in a paperback edition — are of considerable interest.

Hanfstaengl, the scion of a prominent Munich family, was an intimate of Hitler before and after his rise to power in 1933. At one point, he was Hitler's foreign press secretary. But, disillusioned with the Nazis, he escaped to Switzerland in 1937. From there, he went to Britain and thence to the United States, advising the American government on the inner workings of the Nazi regime.

A Harvard graduate whose mother was a New England patrician, he made the acquaintance of Hitler in 1921, shortly after his return to Germany from New York City, where he had managed the family-owned business. Mesmerized by a speech Hitler had delivered in a Munich beer hall, he threw in his lot with the Nazis.

Hanfstaengl, who describes himself as "an idealistic National Socialist," was swayed by Hitler's oratorical skills. He believed that Hitler was capable of lifting Germany into greatness following its ignominious defeat in World War I. But his hopes were predicated on the shaky assumption that traditional conservatives like himself would be able to "tame" Hitler's "excesses" and remove the radicals who surrounded him. How wrong they were!

"Throughout our long association," he writes, "I tried to imbue him [Hitler] with some of the norms and ideas of civilized existence, only to be thwarted by the ignorant fanatics who were his closest cronies."

In particular, Hanfstaengl objected to Hitler's "blatant" anti-Semitism and the "hazy race mystique" championed by Nazi ideologues like Alfred Rosenberg. But not surprisingly, given his fixation with Hitler, Hanfstaengl was anything but a philo-Semite. Predictably, he subscribed to the belief that German Jews were too powerful and should be cut down to size.

As he puts it: "There was one occasion when Hitler was talking about Jews to a visiting British [politician]...and I was being very careful to emphasize that the Nazis only [sic] demanded the reduction of their representation in the professions to the same proportion as their strength in the population." It's clear, then, that Hanfstaengl was receptive to the idea of restricting the rights of German Jews by means of a numerus clausus policy, the hallmark of all anti-Semites.

Hanfstaengl, however, saves much of his condescension for East European Jews who resided in Germany. In his view, they were the "real problem."

As distasteful as Hanfstaengl's subliminal anti-Semitism may be, it should not deter a reader. His pen portrait of Hitler is instructive and his appraisal of Nazi personalities and politics is revealing. As such, Hitler, The Missing Years is a worthy historic document.

Talmud was designed to stimulate debate

By RABBI YEHIEL W. BEN AYON

In a new posting, a rabbi presided over a minor ruckus every time the congregation was about to recite the Shema Yisrael. Half the congregation felt one should stand for the Shema, but the other half believed it should be recited while the congregation was seated.

Unable to negotiate a compromise, the rabbi asked the religious committee to accompany him to a residence where several seniors lived. Here, he hoped, they would establish once and for all the correct and original custom of the synagogue.

The respective cases were presented before the old timers: To sit or to stand? After listening intently to both sides, they proceeded to reject both as incorrect. The rabbi was now totally puzzled. If the custom was neither to sit nor to stand, then how was it done in the old days?

"Oh, how it was in the old days, you want to know. In the old days, every time the congregation was about to say the Shema an argument broke out. That is how it was."

Difference of opinion and debate have been a part of us for as long as anyone can recall. Our greatest text after the Torah is one of constant argument and debate. It is called the Talmud! It is revered and studied daily. What would otherwise be a dusty and obsolete legal text is infused with intellectual energy and vitality precisely because of the debate within.

Talmudic logic teaches us that two forms of argument exist, one positive, one negative. The classic arguments of the School of Shamai versus the School of Hillel are not only acceptable, we actually welcome them. The biblical account of Korach and his clan are not. They represent division, derision of the Divine and of the binding nature of the Torah's instruction.

When we see division within us, we need a measure of honesty and sophistication to discern between these two. Are the arguments based on ego, personality or power? If so, then we must summon all our efforts to neutralize them. If the debate is dynamic and productive, then we must summon all our efforts to participate and grow through it.

Unity in brotherhood is our unique premium in the history of nations. Ours is the only people that was so before the creation of a national homeland (Israel) or the founding of a faith (Judaism). Today, we again have both. Let us work together and aggressively to protect that unity that preceded them both.

Jewish courts regulated business

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

One of the main purposes of a Jewish court system is to regulate undesirable economic practices. Among the economic practices that may require the intervention of a Jewish court is that of "inappropriate" competition in the workplace.

We are all aware that increased competition is in the best interest of the consumer. However, increased competition can also lead to unwanted results such as a firm being driven out of business with its attendant loss of jobs.

How does an economic system that is run according to Jewish law balance the needs of the consumer with those of business people? Can one open a store next door to the competition? The view accepted by Jewish law is that as long as both owners pay their share of local taxes, then the new owners can say, "I do what I want on my property and you do what you want on yours."

Some authorities maintain that the above rules regarding "freedom of entry" only apply if the effect of the new business entry is only to reduce the profit margin of the entrenched business. But if it would drive him out of business completely, price protection for the original owner would be imposed by a Jewish court upon the new business entrant.

However, even the "protectionist" school of thought would agree that no price protection would be warranted if the old store cannot compete as a result of inefficiencies such as poor production methods, lack of computerization or poor service.

This is seen by the fact that the rabbis rule that a store-owner who offers his goods at a discounted price is to be praised; cries of protest by the competition are ignored as they too can offer to match the sale price.

Cries of protest by competition are ignored

A more complex case is one in which the efficient mom and pop shop cannot compete against the huge corporations that can easily undercut the local competition. In such an instance it would appear — according to the protectionist school — that their plea for protection would be granted.

Other authorities maintain that even if a person's livelihood will be destroyed, the court will adopt a laissez-faire attitude. The benefits of increased competition outweigh the harm done to individual business people. Therefore, as long as one pays his fair share of taxes, one can operate his business where and when he pleases.

According to this school of thought, a business person would only be protected against the predatory practice of his competitors because here the intent is to drive the competition out of business. An example of this would be selling goods at below cost. It would appear though, that selling certain items as a "loss leader" would be allowed if the intent is to draw customers into the store who will also purchase other items which are sold for a profit.

It is illuminating to see the approach taken to the Halachah of competition by one of the greatest Jewish leaders of the 20th century, the Chafetz Chaim. After opening up a small grocery shop to help support his family, he quickly realized that patrons were abandoning other stores in order to support this outstanding scholar. He therefore only opened his store a couple of hours a day so as not to harm the competition. When he saw that people planned their shopping for the short time he was open, he closed down his store completely so as not to encroach on the profits of his "competition."

The Sunflower: On the Possibilities & Limits of Forgiveness*, by Simon Wiesenthal (Random House, $33.50).

Is it possible to forgive a Nazi murderer? Can such an act even be considered by the inmate of a concentration camp who is himself destined for death? Is the Jewish concept of tshuvah broad enough to include a young German soldier, a member of the SS, who committed unspeakable crimes? Can one offer forgiveness for an entire people? Isn't forgiveness, ultimately, in the hands of God? Is it possible to forgive without forgetting?

These are some of the questions that flow from an incident in the life of Simon Wiesenthal. It happened in Lvov, where he was a concentration camp inmate in 1942. As a member of a labor gang, he was sent to work at a local hospital. Suddenly, a nurse appeared and led him to a hospital bed where a blinded, almost completely bandaged German soldier lay at death's door.

The soldier implored Wiesenthal to listen to his story. He had to unburden himself to a Jew. The immobilized patient then related how he helped to herd helpless Jews into an empty building that was then set on fire. Those who attempted to escape were shot. One image remained burned in his consciousness, that of a family including a little boy with black hair and dark blue eyes whom he ruthlessly murdered. Wiesenthal listened to this recital, which included a whispered plea for forgiveness. He remained thoughtful for a moment and then left the room without answering.

A shorter, edition of this book was published in 1976 and included responses by a number of eminent Jewish and Christian theologians, scholars and writers to the question, "What would you have done?" This new edition includes some of the original answers along with 30 additional ones by such well known personalities as the Dalai Lama, Rabbi Harold Kushner, Cynthia Ozick, Cardinal Franz Konig of Vienna, Harry Wu (Chinese human rights activist), Joseph Telushkin and Deborah Lipstadt.

> 'Once again the Nazi was using the Jew as a tool'

Taken together, the 46 brief essays offer a storehouse of views and feelings on the complex of guilt and forgiveness. Interestingly, most of the Jewish respondents agree, in one way or another, that Wiesenthal did the right thing — he had no alternative. A majority of the Christian answers suggest that some form of forgiveness should have been offered.

Abraham Heschel writes, "No one can forgive crimes committed by other people. It is therefore preposterous to assume that anybody alive can extend forgiveness for the suffering of any one of the six million people who perished."

The cardinal of Vienna suggests, "Considering your situation at the time and recalling what you went through, an explicit pardon would have surpassed our concept of the human. Nevertheless, you had an opportunity to put forward an act of almost superhuman goodness in the midst of a subhuman and bestial world of atrocities. The fact that you did not take advantage of this opportunity may be what still haunts you as a striving human being."

A different approach to the question is taken by Rabbi Harold Kushner. Forgiveness, he maintains, is something we do for ourselves. It represents a letting go of the sense of grievance and perhaps, more importantly, letting go of the role of victim.

For Primo Levi, the act of the SS soldier was sheer impudence. "Once again, the Nazi was using the Jew as a tool, unaware of the danger and the shock his request must have constituted for the prisoner: his action, examined in depth, is tinged with egoism, since one detects in it an attempt to load onto another one's own anguish."

Since this book was first published, the world has witnessed other mass murders — think of Cambodia, Rwanda and Bosnia. The salient questions this provocative book raises are no less pertinent today than they were three decades ago.

THE BORINS BEAT

Wasn't that David Sugar at the opening of the magnificent Peter Munk Cardiac Centre at The Toronto Hospital, General Division? Terrific to see its wonderful world-renowned heart surgeon, Dr. Tirone David, receive the 1997 Medec Award for Medical Achievement following his just being awarded the Order of Canada designation. Fergie, the Duchess of York, was warm and gracious in her personal remarks and Peter Munk was beaming.

Some of the recent birthdays I've acknowledged (& now you can too): Ted Rogers, David Goldstein, Paul Morton, Michael Appleton, David Kelman's big 80th, Herb Binder's big six-oh, Hartley Nathan Q.C., Dora Litwack, Paul Beeston, Honey Martin (were you surprised?) Douglas Bassett, Alex Eisen, Art Rockert, Myron Gottlieb, Henry Liss, Sheila Mostyn & Dr. Norton Lithwick. Congratulations to Matthew Barrett on his upcoming nuptials with Anne-Marie and congratulations on the engagement of Flory Lebow and Bob Cohen. That proves good things happen to nice folks!!!

Speaking of Bank of Montreal, it was great to finally meet Nada Ristich, Corporate Donations Manager, up close and personal.

For my birthday, it was a thrill to be sung happy birthday by Sheila Engel, Dr. Norton Lithwick and Elaine Yaffe from the 5th floor of York Finch General Hospital.

Gino Empry (ace impressario & press release maven) & I agree Shopsy should open an uptown location. Are you listening Lewis Allen?

Thanks to Saul Korman (Korry's) for his support & for welcoming another generation to his great Danforth clothing store . . . Richard Borins (Osler, Hoskin & Harcourt) . . . speaking of Osler, congratulations to partner Joseph Steiner on his election as president of U.J.A. Federation of Greater Toronto of which Reena is a beneficiary agency . . . and also to chair Edgar and Rosemary (her book "The Glitter Girls" is always by my telephone) Sexton on the birth of their granddaughter, Gillian. Saul's column, now in the Financial Post, was the inspiration for mine starting in 1988 and Rosemary's gossip column in the Globe & Mail inspired my naming names approach!!!

We're loathe to let go of some of our special people. Larry Grossman Q.C. took sports and life and politics seriously and made us do that too. Our four seats at Exhibition Stadium were beside the visitors' dugout, but we could always hear Larry shouting at Roy Hartsfield from behind the Jay's dugout, while we both took aim at third base coach Jackie Moore, in those heady days of major league baseball in April, 1997. We lived across the street on Montressor . Our twin sons, Andrew & Matthew were born during that opening week & Larry heard about it on CKEY. I was just reminiscing with Stan Kugelmass (Blaney, McMurty - where Chusid & Friedman now practice). It's ironic that Larry & I used to play ball against one another on B'nai Brith teams and when I was a B'nai Brith coordinator of special gifts we got Murray Chusid to be Chair of the Foundation, a position he still holds.

Congratulations to Elaine Todres, president of the Baycrest Centre Foundation on Leo Fine Q.C. recently being appointed as Chair of the Baycrest Centre Foundation Board of Directors. Be sure to get him to tell you some of his great yiddish stories of early Toronto.

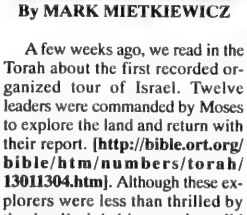
Good luck to Jacqueline Yaffe as she embarks on her new career at Royal LePage Real Estate Services Ltd., the Parks Branch & to Alysa-Beth Engel on her art show of Recent Works - acrylic on canvas - at Ace Bakery, during July. I love her "Women on a Hammock" which hangs at a lovely home on Ridley Blvd. in the City of North York.

It was fun working with Thom Gallagher, Public Affairs, CIBC. His family's Pike's Awning business was in the next building to my Wheat Sheaf Tavern for many years. His dad Harold owned the building next to mine. The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce has taken a lead in supporting the Toby & Henry Battle Developmental Centre & Reena's proud to permanently honour CIBC for their generosity by naming the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce Greenhouse/Gardening Workshop. The Bank prides itself on its ability to help ordinary Canadians secure their future and realize their hopes and dreams. Reena Foundation was created with a similar philosophy, to secure the future and unlock the dreams of mentally and physically challenged Canadians. The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce is a most welcome and fitting addition to Reena's growing list of capital campaign donors.

Why is abbreviation such a long word?

Stuff like the new bells at St. James' Cathedral, Mike Filey & Paul Godfrey, the LIZZIES DINNER, my tour of Beth Tzedec's rogues gallery by JUDY FELD CARR & JULES SURDIN. KOO KOO ROO and Dr. Sheldon Nadal will have to keep 'til next time.

Jerry Borins is the Capital Campaign Director for the Reena Foundation's Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre, a highly visible, fully accessible facility located in the City of Vaughan. The Centre will ensure people with developmental handicaps realize their full potential. The $7.7 million campaign will be successfully completed in 1997. Call Jerry at (416) 787-9554 ext. 3074 to discuss your support and the dedication opportunities still available.



Time to travel Israel on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

A few weeks ago, we read in the Torah about the first recorded organized tour of Israel. Twelve leaders were commanded by Moses to explore the land and return with their report. [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/numbers/torah/13011304.htm]. Although these explorers were less than thrilled by the land's inhabitants, they did confirm that this was a wondrous place "flowing with milk and honey." Since then, millions of tourists have followed in their footsteps. And if you are planning a visit to Israel, you can benefit from other travellers' expertise — thanks to the Jewish Highway.

Before leaving, read up about the country. You'll find several good introductions to Israel and its citizens, such as Travelnet's Communities of Israel [http://www.travelnet.co.il/tnet/israel/general/communit.htm] and Facts about Israel [http://www.geocities.com/~israel-touring/fact_index. html]. I also recommend Cullen Murphy's article Hallowed Ground in the Atlantic Monthly [http://www2.TheAtlantic.com/atlantic/issues/95dec/israel/israel.htm].

Don't miss the link at the end of the piece to another Atlantic article called Tel Aviv: Secular City. You can find other personal essays about Israel or share one of your own at [http://www.travelnet.co.il/tnet/win/index.htm].

There are many Web sites where you can start planning your itinerary. The Ministry of Tourism's Infotour is a plain but extremely comprehensive listing of the country's major attractions [http://www.infotour.co.il/].

I tested it out by looking for information about ice skating rinks. (You never know when the bug will hit you to lace up some skates.) Well, Canada Centre in the town of Metulla in the Upper Galilee [http://www.infotour.co.il/itm_opt.cgi?7085+36] does indeed offer skating as do several other rinks across the country.

Looking for some more basic information? Try Maven's Travel and Tourism [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/ idx167.htm]; Maven's Hotels and Accommodation [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx143.htm]; Bazak's Travelnet [http://www.travelnet.co.il/]; and JC-Navigate: Travel [http://www.jcn18.com/JHOT11.HTM].

That should keep you busy. Next time, we'll look at some pages that will help you organize your money, maps and time and we'll visit some Israeli travel sites that are a bit off the beaten path.

Jewish leaders angered by war crimes action delay

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — News that proceedings against an alleged Nazi war criminal from Quebec have been adjourned until Dec. 1 has angered Jewish community leaders.

According to new reports last week, Montreal Rosemount resident Vladimir Katriuk, 75, who was accused in October 1996 of taking part in atrocities against citizens in Belarus and the Ukraine between 1942 and 1944, will not have to face first deportation proceedings against him until December because his lawyer, Orest Rudzik, is preoccupied with another war crimes case in Toronto.

Katriuk, a beekeeper by profession, has denied participating in any atrocities and defended himself as a victim of Communist persecution.

"Fifteen months might not seem like a lot [from the time charges were first filed]," said Bernie Farber, national community relations director for Canadian Jewish Congress.

"But every minute of delay creates more palpable frustration and anger," he said.

Farber acknowledged that the federal government faces a tough balancing act in war crimes cases: weighing the rights of the accused to due process against the necessity to move these cases along as expeditiously as possible given the advanced ages of the accused.

The obvious danger is that with such delays, there is a risk of the accused dying in Canada before the cases are resolved and justice can be seen to be done, Farber said.

Two accused persons, Antanas Kenstavicius and Joseph Nemsila, have already died before their denaturalization proceedings were completed.

"Each delay is a setback," Farber said, "since it gives them more time to stay in Canada.

"These are extraordinary cases, and what has to be found is correct, yet extraordinary, means to resolve them."

Farber also noted that the process has moved quicker in the United States.

Cases there launched by the Office of Special Investigations have taken an average of 15 months to two years to denaturalize and to deport suspects.

In Canada, it can take two years just to strip a suspect of citizenship. It can take another two years to deport.

Such was the case of Nazi war criminal Jacob Lutjens, so far the only successful Canadian deportation case. He was expelled to Holland in 1992, but only after four years of proceedings and appeals.

While expressing frustration over the latest delay, Farber did not impune the good faith of the federal government.

Ottawa, he said, has lived up to its commitment to name 12 suspected Nazi collaborators – the last of the 12 was Montreal resident Memertas Rolland Maciukas last week.

He is facing denaturalization proceedings for alleged participation in the notorious 12th Lithuanian Battalion, which collaborated with the Nazis in the slaughter of Jews and Gypsies in Lithuania and Byelorussia.

Former Dartmouth mayor surprised by Order of Canada

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Eight weeks ago, Joseph Zatzman received a registered letter from the Governor General's residence at Rideau Hall.

"I was surprised, stunned and very pleased," says the 84-year old former mayor of Dartmouth, N.S., and a major contributor to the Jewish and general communities of Halifax and environs.

The letter informed Zatzman that he was being named a member of the Order of Canada, but suggested he keep the information secret until a public statement was made in early July.

"I've had many faxes and telephone calls in the last 24 hours," he says, the day after the July 3 announcement was made. "I even had people approach me in the grocery store while I was shopping with my wife, Leah, and I don't even know who they are. Last night, we went out to dinner and the restaurant owner wouldn't let me or my party pay. I asked him how many times I could pull this off," he says with a chuckle.

Zatzman is well-known throughout Nova Scotia. Recognized for his achievements in industry and business, he was a small grocery store operator in Dartmouth in the 1940s but soon entered real estate, acquiring some small apartment buildings. He quickly became a major player in the rental housing business and now owns several large complexes in the Halifax metro area.

He served on Dartmouth city council for 12 years, including four as mayor in the 1960s. It was his foresight that convinced his council to purchase land in suburban Dartmouth, which soon became Burnside Industrial Park.

"I told them, if you won't buy it for the city, I'll buy it personally," he laughs today. Fortunately, his councillors recognized his commitment and listened to him. Burnside is now the largest business park east of Montreal.

He has served on more than 20 volunteer organizations, holds an honorary doctorate from Saint Mary's University in Halifax and recently retired after four years as chairman of the province's Resource Development Board, after 20 years without taking a salary.

Zatzman chaired the Halifax United Jewish Appeal campaign in the 1960s and was co-chair of the building committee of Beth Israel Synagogue when it erected a new facility in the 1950s.

A three-time-a-week golfer, he still goes to his real estate office every day but says, "I've been demoted by my son Michael [who runs the business today].

"I was in Florida and when I came back, I found I'd been demoted from president to chairman of the board."

Jewish performers join Vancouver music festival

By DAVID LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The city's 20th annual folk music festival, July 18 to 20, offers a variety of artists and an eclectic blend of music.

The sounds of the Middle East will be represented by Maza Meze as well as Adel Awad. Awad who was born in Egypt, performs with the local Jewish band Tzimmes.

The folk fest also features several Jewish performers, including veterans Cathy Fink (who will be performing with Marcy Marcer), Bob Snider and Si Kahn.

Fink and Marcer are veterans of the folk music scene who perform a variety of music including bluegrass, country and swing.

Kahn, who was active in the civil rights movements in the 1960s, has been recording folk and bluegrass music for about 20 years.

Snider, from Toronto, began his singing career as a busker in 1987.

Singer/songwriter and keyboardist Bobby Wiseman will be performing at his first Vancouver folk fest along with The Binder Specialists featuring Liz Tecar, Selina Martin and Morgan Doctor.

Wiseman, who was born in the south end of Winnipeg but now lives in Toronto, is the former keyboardist with the Canadian band, Blue Rodeo. (They performed at last year's Bumbershoot festival). He has recorded several tunes which explore Jewish themes.

The song, Have a Nice Day which is taken from his 1992 release City of Wood, is a tongue-in-cheek tribute to Doug Christie, the lawyer who defended Canadian Holocaust deniers Ernst Zundel and Jim Keegstra. How Round the Earth, a song taken from the same recording, describes an anti-Semitic incident he experienced in Winnipeg.

Wiseman mentions names in his songs because "the only time change happens in the world is through embarrassment," he says.

Another Jewish performer, Dan Bern, whose parents fled Europe to escape the Nazis, says their experiences "affect my music."

In his song, Lithuania, which appears on his next album, he recites the names of uncles, aunts and grandparents who perished in the Holocaust.

He wrote Jerusalem about three years ago when he spent 10 days in the Jewish capital.

Bern, however, doesn't think of himself as a Jewish artist. "I don't generally put myself into categories," he says. "I happen to be Jewish, I happen to be male, I happen to be from Iowa originally and I happen to be a Giants fan, but I don't think of myself as a Jewish artist.

"The whole thing of being an artist is about freedom and to be whoever they are...and to be able to change and shift and grow and not to be bound by any categories that people have set for them," he adds.

Israel Day Caravan comes to Niagara Falls

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

ST. CATHARINES, Ont. — As part of the small Jewish community here for almost a decade, Rosalie Samosh feels she has to work harder to make sure her children, age 7, 9 and 11, are educated Jewishly and feel connected to other Jews.

Recently the load was lightened somewhat for her and other parents when Israel Day Caravan came to B'nai Jacob Congregation in nearby Niagara Falls, Ont.

The event was a pilot project under the joint auspices of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region; youth movements Betar-Tagar, Canadian Young Judaea, Habonim Dror and Hashomer Hatzair; and the Canada Israel Experience Centre, which provided the funding.

It is planned to run in about half a dozen small communities in Ontario over the coming year, beginning with Sault Ste. Marie in September, said Jennifer Turack, director of community services and youth activities, CJC, Ontario region.

Niagara Falls' B'nai Jacob Congregation – of which Samosh's father, Rabbi Nathan Liberman, is spiritual leader – was the site of the event, which also included St. Catharines' two synagogues, Congregation B'nai Israel and Temple Tikvah.

Samosh estimates a total of about 160 families are affiliated with the two St. Catharines synagogues, and a further 35 to 40 families with the Niagara Falls congregation, although many of them live in St. Catharines.

"It's a struggle in a small community. We always rely on the same people," said Samosh, who teaches Hebrew school. "I think for the most part we've been very successful," but the caravan provided "a little bit of that ruach that I experienced in Toronto events." She lauded Congress for the support it provides to small Jewish communities. "They have been wonderful."

Niagara Falls already had annual Israel Day programs, Turack noted. Both she and Samosh have been involved in organizing them, with the emphasis in years past on involving children.

"We've always tried to offer something partly educational and entertaining," Samosh said. "It's an opportunity for the community to get together."

She rated this year's event, attended by an estimated 75 people, as "a very valuable program," with appeal for both adults and children. "It really helps develop a sense of community and ensure that we acknowledge Israel's independence. It's such a part of our culture and our community."

Ryan Hass, shaliach for Canadian Young Judaea, ran a program on Jewish identity and religious pluralism that Samosh said was one of the best adult programs she's ever attended.

Youngsters learned about four Israeli cities through arts and crafts activities such as making plasticine versions of Jerusalem's Old City. Older children created a banner for the synagogue depicting a day in the life of Israel.

Singer/guitarist Kim Kowarsky-Doron, who Samosh said faced the challenge of trying "to involve people from age 3 to 80," got them up and dancing to Israeli music. A taste of the Middle East was apparent in the falafel lunch and birthday cake for Israel.

"We had excellent feedback," said Turack. "People had a very good time."

Hillel scholarships presented

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadians are well represented among this year's Hillel Leadership Scholarship award winners. Of the 15 such scholarships given this year by the Washington, D.C.-based Hillel International, four went to Canadian students studying at Canadian institutions.

Maya Haasz, Ira Markus, Sharrona Pearl and Ilana Reitzes – and their 11 American counterparts – will spend the coming year studying at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Rothberg School for Overseas Students in a program that includes classes, workshops, leadership development training and field trips.

Maya Haasz

Ilana Reitzes

Acceptance of the $1,000 (US) scholarship commits students to participating in program activities and to spend time on their return to North America promoting Israel awareness and activism.

Haasz, 19, a Montreal native and recent graduate of Dawson College (CEGEP) who plans a career in medicine, intends to take politics and Jewish studies courses in Israel. "I'm going into science for the rest of my life. These are things I know I won't get to take when I come back."

A graduate of Herzliah High School, Haasz has taken an active role in Hillel at Dawson, most recently as a vice-president for the past year. For both years at CEGEP she chaired Hillel's social action committee.

The leadership component of the year ahead is particularly appealing to Haasz, a past regional president of B'nai Brith Youth Organization who is also involved in the student wing of FEDERATION CJA and the young leadership division of the Jewish National Fund. "I know I'll be involved in the community when I come back," she said.

Reitzes, 19, an American-born Torontonian who has been studying for the past two years at McGill University, is hoping to "gain stronger ties with Israel and an enhanced Jewish identity." A graduate of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Reitzes, like the other participants, has a solid base on which to build.

A student of anthropology and religious studies, she plans to pursue those subjects at the Hebrew University. She also hopes to attend a graduate-level course on Chassidism, a particular interest of hers, and possibly more classes at another Jewish educational institution.

Among her volunteer activities at McGill was involvement in an Arab-Israeli dialogue group. Before leaving for Israel in August, she is working as a summer intern at UJA Federation.

Ira Markus, also 19, has finished his second year at the University of Toronto with a double major in political science and history.

A graduate of United Synagogue Day School and CHAT, Markus has "kind of a passion for Israel. I wanted any opportunity or excuse to go."

Most of his courses, he said, will give him credit towards his U of T degree. "I hope to come back with at least a little more knowledge of the way Israeli politics works [and] a better understanding of Israeli culture."

"It's very exciting. It's always been a dream of mine to study in Israel," said Pearl, 20, who just finished her second year at York University studying science history and humanities.

Although she'll be based at the Hebrew University, in some ways the alumna of Associated Hebrew Schools and CHAT sees all of Israel as her campus for the coming year. "It will give me a much better understanding of my history, a context I wouldn't be able to get here."

As social action chair for the university's Jewish Student Federation, Pearl worked on projects such as a clothing drive (with environmental studies students) and served as the York coordinator for the Out of the Cold program to feed the homeless, volunteering every week at Holy Blossom Temple, where the program was based.

Israelis, Palestinians discuss Gaza airport

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As Israel and the Palestinians attempted to resume negotiations last week, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu sought to head off the stirrings of another coalition crisis.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and Palestinian Authority official Nabil Sha'ath met to discuss the opening of a Palestinian airport in the Gaza Strip.

The airport is one of the outstanding elements of the interim phase agreement signed by the two sides that must still be implemented.

The sides have been at odds over Israeli demands to maintain overall security supervision of the terminal.

Mordechai's spokesperson said after the talks, in which the Egyptian and U.S. ambassadors to Israel also took part, that the meeting was "effective" and had been conducted in a "positive and good atmosphere."

The spokesperson said Mordechai told Sha'ath that Foreign Minister David Levy, who is responsible for coordinating negotiations with the Palestinians, was drawing up a negotiating team and would soon approve the start of negotiations on the matter.

The discussions did not touch on some of the larger issues of contention in Israeli-Palestinian peace talks, namely constructing in disputed territory.

The Palestinians broke off negotiations in mid-March, after Israel began building a new Jewish neighborhood in southeastern Jerusalem.

Meanwhile, sources in the Prime Minister's Office were quoted in Israeli media as expressing concern that National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon might lead right-wing opposition against the opening of the airport.

He might also oppose further Israeli troop redeployment in the West Bank, which is scheduled for the fall under the interim accords.

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz quoted sources in the Prime Minister's Office and senior Likud members as being worried that Sharon might act in response to Ya'acov Ne'eman's appointment as finance minister.

After Dan Meridor resigned the post last month, Sharon had been the leading candidate. However, recently, he was informed that the post would go to Ne'eman instead. Levy had fiercely opposed Sharon's appointment.

During a tour of the north, Sharon sharply attacked the prime minister, accusing him of not consulting with him on security and political affairs.

For his part, Netanyahu said he hoped the two could meet again. Sources in the Prime Minister's Office reiterated Netanyahu's pledge to consult with Sharon on matters of importance.

Russia said ready to downgrade cooperation with Iran

By HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Clinton administration believes that Russia now understands the severity with which Washington and Jerusalem view its cooperation with Iran, and is willing to act on it, according to an Israeli official.

While he does not know what the results of the American effort will be, or what promises the Russians made to the United States, the official said Moscow is checking into the issue. Unlike in the past, Moscow "is now more attentive to what the Americans are saying" about its missile sales and nuclear plant assistance to Iran," he said.

The matter was advanced at last month's economic summit in Denver, when President Bill Clinton, at the request of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, raised the matter with Russian President Boris Yeltsin, the official said, confirming published reports.

Meanwhile, Israel does not believe it can put off the UN General Assembly session on Har Choma, and the United States has not promised to oppose any draft that is brought before the forum, a second official stated.

"The Americans will try to moderate them, of course," the official said, referring to Egypt and the Palestinians, the primary sponsors of the session, "but I don't think they can do much."

A key stumbling block is that the session is being held in the larger forum rather than in the Security Council, where Washington has a veto, which it exercised this spring on a resolution condemning Israel over the Har Choma construction.

Ambassador Eliahu Ben-Elissar met last week with Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Thomas Pickering, but received no U.S. assurances on acting against the Palestinian effort.

Nato leaders meet in Madrid

Pickering was the chief State Department official in town last week, while Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and Assistant Secretary of State Strobe Talbott attended the NATO expansion meeting in Madrid.

Ben-Elissar also met with House Speaker Newt Gingrich to update him on the UN situation.

Israel has informed the Palestinians it sees the matter gravely, because the Palestinians' UN effort is proceeding while Jerusalem and the Palestinian Authority are seeking to break the freeze in peace talks, the officials stated.

"We've shown the Palestinians enough fairness, to expect them not to attack us so harshly in an international forum while we're trying to restart negotiations," an Israeli official said.

Italy to return gold to Jews

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Italy will return gold, jewelry and other valuables plundered by the Nazis from Jews in northeastern Italy during World War II, according to a law passed this week in Rome.

The Italian Treasury Ministry announced last week that parliament had given final approval to a bill sponsored by Treasury Minister Carlo Azeglio Ciampi to hand over the contents of five sacks of valuables discovered in a Treasury vault earlier this year.

The sacks contain jewelry, precious stones, watches, coins, silver cutlery and other objects, personal items, gold and even gold teeth that were looted from Jews at the Nazi death camp of San Saba, near Trieste.

They soon will be handed over to the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, the umbrella body of Italian Jews, which will in turn give them to the Jewish community of Trieste.

Tullia Zevi, president of the union, expressed appreciation for "the correctness, the timeliness and the speed" of the Parliament. "I hope that this example will be followed by other countries."

A Treasury Ministry statement said that the law "is of great moral significance and puts our country among the first to take legal steps to fulfil a duty of civility and solidarity towards the Jewish communities."

Claims for Holocaust compensation by the Trieste Jewish community, backed by a campaign last January in the local Trieste newspaper, prompted a government investigation into what had happened to the possessions of Trieste-area Jews who had been sent to San Saba.

A commission established that the goods had belonged to Jews killed or interned in San Saba, the only Nazi death camp on Italian soil.

The investigation revealed that the plundered treasure was taken to Klagenfurt, in Austria, by the retreating Germans at the end of the war, where it was hidden in the cellars of the local Nazi chief.

After the war, the valuables were brought back to Trieste by the Allies, but only a small fraction was claimed by surviving Jews.

The rest was deposited in a Trieste bank vault and eventually sent to the Treasury in Rome for safekeeping in 1962.

No longer "captive Jews" behind the Iron Curtain, these Jewish communities now are demonstrating a growing self-confidence in their identity and are demanding recognition as full-fledged members of the Jewish world.

"Of course we need and appreciate cooperation with all the international Jewish organizations," Warsaw Jewish representative Stanislaw Krajewski told attendees at a recent conference in Strasbourg on Strengthening Jewish Life in Europe.

"But being partners means we should not be ignored."

Poland's Jewish leadership was particularly blunt on the issue last month.

Jerzy Kichler, the newly elected 49-year-old president of the Union of Jewish Communities in Poland, issued a statement backing Poland's entry into NATO.

In doing so, he categorically rejected attempts by the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO) to link NATO entry to Warsaw's handling of the restitution of Jewish property.

Polish officials fear that such opposition could harm the chances of securing the U.S. congressional approval needed to ratify the admission of new members to NATO.

"We believe that Poland's entry to NATO serves the interests of our country and of all its citizens, including Polish Jews,' Kichler's statement said. "It can only improve the situation of Jews in Poland."

Half a century after three million Polish Jews were murdered in the Holocaust, the Polish Jewish community, though numbering only in the thousands, is trying to re-establish a viable presence as an integrated part of Polish society.

Kichler's election in May put community leadership firmly in the hands of a post-Holocaust generation.

This generation's aim is to create a Jewish life that fits the nature of present-day Polish Jews – Jews who, as one community member put it, are "as Polish as French Jews are French."

Kichler' statement backing NATO membership demonstrated the community's growing desire to make its voice heard – and heeded – on issues relating to the future of both the community and Poland.

Meanwhile, the American Jewish Committee's (AJC) board of governors, meeting in New York last month, also passed a resolution supporting Poland's entry into NATO.

Value of aid weighed

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

When Benjamin Netanyahu addressed the U.S. Congress last July, he spoke of his intention to make Israel's economy self-reliant and to gradually wean it off American economic aid.

A year on, Netanyahu has begun this very process, albeit modestly. Israel, which receives $3 billion in U.S. aid annually, of which $1.2 billion takes the form of economic assistance, has agreed to a $50 million cut, which will be channeled to Jordan. (Fifty million dollars was also skimmed from Egypt, the recipient of slightly more than $2 billion in yearly American aid.)

It's clear that Israel can manage without U.S. economic assistance. Israel has ceased being a poor country, as it was in the early years of its existence, when rationing was in effect. Israel's economy is now larger than that of all of its Arab neighbors and its per capita income is approaching that of Britain. Indeed, Israel ranks as the sixteenth wealthiest nation in the world.

In addition to American government aid, Israel gets more than $1.5 billion in private U.S. funds per year: $1 billion in tax-deductible donations and $500 million in Israel Bonds.

Cognizant of these realities, Yossi Beilin, the former Israeli deputy foreign minister, added a new element to Israeli-Diaspora discourse when, in a well-publicized speech some years ago, he wondered out loud "how we [can] go on asking for your charity?"

It's a good question, and it complements Netanyahu's interest in reducing, if not altogether eliminating, Israel's reliance on U.S. economic aid. But Netanyahu is hardly the first Israeli personality who has broached the subject.

Zalman Shoval, the Israeli ambassador to Washington in the early 1990s, advised Israel to take the initiative in weaning itself off U.S. economic aid.

Yitzhak Rabin, several months before his assassination, intimated that while there was broad support in Congress for maintaining military assistance to Israel, there was no such unanimity regarding its economic aid package.

Reflecting this sentiment, U.S. congressman Sonny Callahan, chair of the sub-committee on foreign assistance, said during a visit to Israel last January that "aid to any country is not an entitlement."

Yossi Beilin

Callahan's implicit warning, unsettling though it may have been, paled in comparison to Senator Bob Dole's advocacy seven years ago of a 5 percent cut in aid to Israel.

Despite these voices, and the mood of fiscal restraint currently prevailing in Congress, the principle of U.S. aid to Israel enjoys widespread and bipartisan backing in Congress.

In 1993, 78 out of 100 senators asked Bill Clinton — the most pro-Israel president in U.S. history — to continue aid to Israel at present levels. Last year, Jesse Helms, chair of the powerful U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee, asserted that cutting assistance to Israel was "off the table." Newt Gingrich, speaker of the House of Representatives, is an outspoken supporter of unconditional aid to Israel.

Be that as it may, even Israel's friends strongly believe that U.S. economic aid has become superfluous. "The time has come for Israel to do itself and the U.S. a major political favor — volunteer to take less economic aid, or none at all," wrote A.M. Rosenthal in the New York Times last June.

And in a persuasive piece in the Wall Street Journal, Joel Bainerman, an Israeli-based journalist who specializes in economic affairs, argued that the loss of such assistance "would be a blessing for Israel's economy." In essence, Bainerman said that U.S. economic aid constrained Israel from adopting free-market policies, which in turn would obviate the need for such assistance.

In nearly five decades, Israel has received $80 billion in U.S. military and economic aid, or one-third of the American foreign aid budget, according to Stephen Zunes in an essay in a recent edition of Middle East Policy. But can such levels of aid be sustained indefinitely, and is this assistance really in Israel's long-range economic interest?

Correction

In our June 26 story, "Builder planning Jewish seniors home in Moscow," a production error affected the meaning of one of the paragraphs. The paragraph, referring to comments by Russian builder Alexander Platonov, should have read:

Well connected to Moscow government officials, Platonov received the consent of Mayor Yuri Louzhkov to proceed. The mayor, Platonov said, is a "decent, very kind person. For him, there's no difference what nationality you are. Unfortunately," he continued, "at the lower levels, the attitude towards Jews is very bad."

Campbell co-writes play

Arts and Sciences. Proceeds from the two evenings went to the My Jewish Discovery Place Children's Museum in Los Angeles.

Featuring 18 actors, all with Broadway experience, and 26 members of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, the play won positive reviews for its forcefulness yet sensitivity.

Told from the perspective of the animals aboard Noah's ark, the work is "deep and dark," Campbell said, but also has humor. It's meant to "raise questions, to be provocative, to have people think seriously about moral responsibility and what our obligations are."

Campbell said she and Felder consulted several Jewish sources in tackling the project, including kabbalah (Jewish mysticism) and rabbinic writings.

In the play, as in the Bible, the world is destroyed. But for Campbell, the larger issue is "when you know you have a seat on the ark, do you have an obligation to question the flood? Of all things Noah does, he never questions the actual flood."

She got to know Felder when he came to the consulate to get a visa for Poland, where he conducted interviews with Holocaust survivors for Stephen Spielberg's Shoah project.

Felder, nephew of the late Rabbi Gedalia Felder of Toronto, told The CJN Campbell "comes with a vast knowledge of ideas and people, aside from someone who was interested in bringing Nazi war criminals to justice."

The duo say the musical is still in rough form and needs work. They plan some polishing over the next year and then hope for a commercial run in Los Angeles, and perhaps, on to Broadway.

Pluck.

אם אתם שייכים לאלה שעבורם מוזיקה קלאסית היא מילה גסה- פשוט תקפצו לקטע הבא ויורם יספר לכם על סרטים חדשים. אבל אם מוזיקה קלאסית עושה לכם טוב- הנה הסוד הכי שמור בטורונטו: יום שבת בערב, או כמעט כל יום אחר, בא לכם לצאת, אתם מרימים טלפון ב- 416-593-4828 Roy Tompson ב- 6:30 בערב וכמעט תמיד יהיו כרטיסים. Rush Tickets יעלו 10 דולאר, וכמעט אף פעם אין אפס. מה שכן - כשמגיע העירה מישהו מפורסם, שאפשר לדבר עליו במסיבות הסלון (פרלמן, צוקרמן, ויומה וכאלה) אל תנסו אפילו. אבל רוב השנה- זה הבילוי הכי זול. בהפקת קונצרט כזה מושקעים רבבות דולארים, ובמחיר 10 דולאר לכרטיס אי אפשר לטעות. הסימפוניה של טורונטו היא תזמורת מעולה,- ממושמעת ובשלה. הינה, בצורה כזו הלכנו ברגע האחרון ותמורת מחיר כרטיס קולנוע שמענו את הפסנתרן הפיני הצעיר והמדהים אולי מוסטונן בקונצרט של גריג, ושתי יצירות קנדיות, שאחת מהן נכתבה על פי סיפורים אסקימוסים ע"י נגן התזמורת עצמה, ריימונד לודקה. בעיר שבה אתה יכול לקבל כרטיס למשחק הוקי רק אם מישהו הוריש לך אותו, או שספקר קילף ממך חמישים דולאר, התזמורת הזו היא ממש חובה. אם אתם מן המתמידים והממושמעים ויש לכם מינוי - סחטן וקחטן. רק רציתי לעדכן את אלה שלא בא להם מינוי וקביעות - חבל לוותר.

Hospital for Sick Children joins Telehealth Clinic

TORONTO — The Hospital for Sick Children (HSC) bridged the geographical distance between Canada, Israel and Argentina within a matter of minutes recently through a new international Telehealth Clinic.

The first two videoconferencing links of the Telehealth Clinic are to the head office of Ezra Le'Marpeh in Bnei Brak, Israel, and Gerrahan Children's Hospital in Buenos Aires, Argentina. A third international site slated to be in place by the end of the year is the Hospital de Clinicas de Porto Alegre, Porto Alegre, Brazil.

"The international Telehealth Clinic exemplifies this hospital's leadership role in pediatric health care, education and research in Canada and abroad," said Dr. Robert Filler, director of external medical affairs at HSC, who also spearheads the hospital's Telehealth Clinic.

Ezra Le'Marpeh is a volunteer organization that provides medical consultations and worldwide medical referrals to people in the community. The centre is directed by Rabbi A.E. Firer from its head office in Bnei Brak. Last year HSC had more than 100 consultations and 30 admissions of Israeli children.

Garrahan Children's Hospital in Argentina celebrates its 10th anniversary in August. Since its inception, more than two million consultations have taken place. This 517-bed public hospital is also a research and teaching centre. It has a 72-bed intensive care unit and a bone marrow transplant unit. It also provides specialized care in neurosurgery, burns and cardiovascular surgery. More than 30 percent of the patients that come to Garrahan are from cities outside Buenos Aires.

The factors taken into consideration for international partner sites include proper transmission networks, time zone compatibility, a lack of language barriers and the potential for research collaboration.

"We also needed technical support and relied on the expertise of Bell Canada, Teleglobe and ADCOM. We asked them to make the system operate as easily as it does when making a local phone call. And they did just that," said Filler.

"We take great pride in being the international delivery partner in a program that will benefit children around the world," said Richard Gendron, vice-president, Business Services and Development for Teleglobe Canada Inc. "Helping the Hospital for Sick Children go global is a very important project for Teleglobe. There is no group who needs the best that our collective efforts can offer more than children."

Physicians and nurses at the Hospital's Telehealth Clinic are now able to diagnose and provide follow-up care for children abroad who need medical and surgical assessment before, during and after treatment.

"Bell Canada is committed to building active partnerships between our business and the communities in which we live. In our view, this is one of the best ways to give our future generations the greatest opportunities for success," said Bob Milne, Group vice-president, Corporate Markets, Bell Canada.

Baycrest to provide services to homes for the elderly

TORONTO — The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care plans to provide specialized medical and dental services to residents of the 10 homes for the aged operated by Metropolitan Toronto.

Beginning this month, Baycrest staff will provide hearing and dental services to all 10 Metro homes, which house about 2,500 people. In addition, the centre will provide foot care services to residents in the five homes closest to the main Baycrest campus on Bathurst Street in North York.

"One of our goals is to make our services available to a broader community," says Rosslyn Bentley, Baycrest's coordinator of ambulatory services. "This initiative allows us to achieve that goal and at the same time provide excellent services to a large group of seniors living in the Metro homes for the aged."

For most appointments, Baycrest staff will go to the other homes so that residents will not have to travel. However, if more complex treatment or investigation is required (such as dental x-rays), a trip to Baycrest may be necessary.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

MUSIC, DANCE, TV

• Alliance Broadcasting has announced a new specialty network called History Television. The new station will supposedly offer an engaging blend of documentaries, movies and original historical programming, beginning Sept. 8.

• Performers at the Free Times Cafe's Bella! Did Ya Eat? brunch extravaganza are Bluma with Jonno Lightstone performing klezmer and Jewish music on July 20, and Ronnie Wiseman performing klezmer on July 27, 11 a.m. to 3 p.m., 320 College St. 416-967-1078.

• The Festival of the Sound's first week runs July 21 to 27 in Parry Sound and offers a variety of sounds, such as sonatas for violin and guitar by Moshe Hammer and Norbert Kraft, and a Cape Breton Ceilidh with fiddler David Greenberg, pianist David Sandall, guitarist Terry McKenna and singer Stephanie Conn. There's also a Baroque Festival, a Bach evening, and a session in which violinists Moshe Hammer, Lenny Solomon and David Greenberg play in tribute to the great masters in styles ranging from baroque to jazz. 705-746-2410.

Arts Out of Town

• Luboml, a Jewish shtetl destroyed in the Shoah after 600 years of thriving activity, lives again in an exhibition of photographs and memorabilia in the Valley of the Communities at Yad Vashem, Jerusalem. The exhibition Luboml, A Small Jewish World, continues through next March.

• The Spertus Museum presents The Dybbuk, an exhibition celebrating the Lyric Opera's American Artists presentation of Shulamit Ran's opera based on the powerful drama of possession by the Yiddish writer Ansky. 618 South Michigan Ave., Chicago. Until Aug. 15. 312-322-1747.

In the Spotlight

Fugitive Pieces, by Toronto writer Anne Michaels, is presently taking the literary world by storm. A novel that personalizes the impersonal brutality of the Holocaust and its after-effects on survivors, the best-seller was "a labor of love" that took 10 years to produce, says Michaels, author of two previous books of poetry and until recently, a creative writing instructor at the University of Toronto.

During its composition she showed the manuscript to nobody. Only when it was "absolutely done" did she bring it to McClelland and Stewart, a leading Canadian publisher, which unhesitatingly accepted it for publication.

Since its appearance in 1996, Fugitive Pieces has won several literary awards in Canada, including the Trillium Award and the Martin and Beatrice Fischer Award for fiction on a Jewish theme. Last month it beat out 130 other entries to snag Britain's prestigious Orange Prize — and a purse equal to about $66,000 — for a single work of fiction in English by a woman.

Rights to the critically acclaimed novel have been sold to dozens of publishers internationally and editions are currently being prepared in Chinese, Japanese, Estonian, Spanish, Portuguese — some 22 languages in all. There have even been some movie offers, the 39-year-old author acknowledges as she settles back in Toronto after a lengthy promotional tour.

"Nothing's been decided yet," she told us recently. "It's important that if someone does make a film, they do it with sensitivity. The project must reflect a certain depth."

KLEZMER COMES TO NORTH YORK

Be prepared to dance to the happy mixture of music as Klapman's Klezmer Band, featuring Yiddish singer Faye Kellerstein (right), Jordan Klapman (left) and Marvin Rosenshein (also known as Marty Rose), performs at Mel Lastman Square in North York on July 27, 7:30 p.m. The concert is free to the public.

Visit to Auschwitz prompts Canadian to create play

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Samantha Swan

TORONTO — A non-Jewish Canadian actor was so shocked by what she saw at Auschwitz that she is the author and the star of a taut drama she hopes will awaken young Canadians to what happened during the Holocaust.

"Those enormous piles of shoes and clothing of the victims burned into my brain," said Samantha Swan, the London-born playwright of Star, one of the 83 plays and 600 productions in the Fringe Festival, which ended July 13.

Star is a resourceful and well written play about Isaac and Lili, a Toronto survivor couple who go back to Berlin to search out Stella (Samantha Swan), a Jewish artist's model who denounced fellow Jews, and find out what motivated her heinous acts.

In the end, only Lili, who at one time was her best friend, confronts Stella about her involvement in Lili's mother's being taken by the Gestapo. But it is a hollow victory, as narcissistic Stella, who once dreamed of being another Marlena Dietrich, denies any wrongdoing, underlining the banality of evil.

Isaac, a pubescent idolizer of Stella (he attended the same school), who still dreams about her svelte figure, does not even bother to see her in the flesh, though he ferreted out her Berlin address. Enamored with "the trivia of the Third Reich," as Lili puts it, Isaac says, "I don't need to see her, I just need to ask the questions."

What alarms this writer is that up to press time, not one of the three Toronto dailies had written even a line, in the reams of Fringe material, in advance, or in review, about Star, a first-rate play. Is the Holocaust no longer of interest to them?

Star is the first production of Cygnet Theatre Company and the ensemble acting of Swan, Gloria Saesura, Athena Reich, Robert Fulton and Giles Hodge does the new group proud —as does its direction by Swan's husband, Christopher Comrie.

All the actors except Swan play several other roles. The effortless scene changes are done in seconds so that the tension never lets up.

With her blonde hair and Aryan good looks, Swan makes a convincing plump artist's model and her scene with Reich, when the two young girls fantasize about Dietrich, is a gem. At curtain, Reich sings a Hebrew folk song about pain and survival.

When her husband finished his work on a film in Budapest in 1992, the couple, who were married in 1991, visited Poland and Auschwitz on a holiday, where the idea for Star was born.

Ivor Dembina, the grandson of Jewish Polish immigrants to England, brought sophisticated humor with a bite to the Fringe, in his one-man show, Stand Up Jewish Comedy.

Working on a bare stage with no props at the non-air conditioned Glen Morris Theatre, Dembina has a deft touch and good timing. "I want to get away from Jews telling in-jokes to each other," he told The CJN. "I think our humor should be far more inclusive. I don't ask my audiences to take down their trousers before they come to the show."

Dembina's trip to Canada, his first, is a bit of a gamble. Following the Toronto Fringe, he's appearing at Fringe Festivals in Winnipeg (July 18 to 27), Saskatoon, Edmonton, Victoria and Vancouver, through the summer.

"I won't make a lot of money, but I hope to cover the cost of the trip The challenge for me is to improve as a comedy performer. My only sponsor is the goodwill of my bank manager."

Dembina, 46, has a Harold Lloyd owlish appearance and likes the Canadian audiences he has seen so far. "They're very open, they like opinionated comedy and I don't have to play to the lowest common denominator."

He's done his homework and has several Canadian references in the show. "Mackenzie King thought Hitler was a smart man and liked dogs. His only trouble was he [Hitler] liked to kill people."

There's an edge to his humor when he talks about the popularity of the movie Schindler's List. "People were interested in how the Jews were victimized by the Nazis, but a lot like to see Jews killed too. That's what I call smart marketing."

If you are putting a play on for the Fringe, you might as well go all the way, which is what the North York Company up in the attic did with Stage Directions by Israel Horovitz of New York, who wrote the acclaimed English Lesson.

Two sisters, played by Terrilee Shannon and Lynn Weintraub (who also directed), and a brother, played by Robert Dodds, gather in the living room of a New England home, to attend the funeral of a parent.

All the characters speak only the stage directions, which describe their activities and emotions. It soon becomes obvious that there is much hostility between them.

Though it is leavened with humor, particularly in Dodds' characterization, the black ending leaves the viewer to question whether playwright Horovitz was writing a send-up of Jewish mourning rituals or taking a serious look at sibling relationships.

DEAD SEA SCROLLS UNDER DISCUSSION

Next week, the Israel Museum in Jerusalem marks the 50th anniversary of the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls at Qumran in 1947 with a major conference that promises to bring together dozens of international scholars and members of the lay public for five days of lectures and activities.

Several exhibits being prepared for the conference should be on view for several months thereafter.

A Day At Qumran documents a day in the life of the mysterious sect that variously composed, copied and collected the scrolls, which number about 850. Among the objects on display are a unique sundial, agricultural tools and phylacteries, as well some scroll fragments not previously exhibited.

As it happens, this year also marks the 100th anniversary of the discovery of the Cairo Genizah — a hidden chamber in an old synagogue in Fostat, Old Cairo — in which some 200,000 fragments of medieval Judaic documents were retrieved in 1897.

The Cairo Genizah: An Exhibit of Life presents some 50 rare and fascinating documents that shed light on almost every aspect of Jewish life in the Mediterranean region in the Middle Ages. The collection includes the famous Damascus Document, as well as documents in the original handwriting of Maimonides and other figures.

Another related exhibition, Meaning and Myth: The Architecture of the Shrine of the Book, traces the elaborate seven-year planning process through which the Israel Museum's distinctive edifice housing several scrolls was conceived and built.

The Israel Museum has a Web site at [http://www.imj.org.il]. Phone 02-6708811.

Chanukah Cruise: Celebrate Chanukah on the Carnival Cruise Line ship Celebration with Rabbi Elyse Goldstein and family, leaving from Tampa, Fla., and visiting Grand Cayman Island, Playa del Carmen, Cozumel and New Orleans.

The seven-night cruise is priced at $1,949 for an outside cabin, $1,799 for an inside cabin, based on double occupancy; $1,549 for third, fourth or fifth in a cabin. Price includes return air Toronto to St. Petersburg, transfers from airport to pier, first night of Chanukah party, Shabbat service and Saturday Torah study, all on-board meals, entertainment, and more.

Medical Tour to Israel: The American Physicians Fellowship for Medicine in Israel is sponsoring Jewish Roots of Medicine and the Ethics of Care, a tour and medical seminar in Israel Nov. 2 to 11, with an optional three-day Jordan add-on. The seminar is co-chaired by Steven T. Katz, PhD, director, Centre for Judaic Studies, Boston University, and author of some two dozen books on Jewish thought and history. The other co-chair is Michael A. Nevins, a New Jersey physician and author of The Jewish Doctor: A Narrative History.

Aeroflot Reaches Toronto: Through an exclusive agreement with Aeroflot Russian International Airlines, Canadian Gateway has introduced a weekly non-stop charter service between Toronto and Moscow in a wide-body Airbus A31-330.

Superlative Guidebooks: Travel Talk has already raved about Knopf's Guide to the Holy Land. Various other Knopf Guides — Egypt, Florence, Morocco, New York, Prague, St. Petersburg, Thailand — also seem in the same rarefied league, combining outstanding graphics and descriptions on every page.

However, the Knopf Guide to Paris seems especially deserving of praise. We spent hours recently going through its pages in fascination. The Knopf series was originally called Borzoi Books and published in France — hence the extraordinary excellence of Paris, which weighs in at nearly 600 pages and costs $35.

Rider hopes to repeat as Olympic competitor

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

BALDWIN, Ont. — So what's a nice Jewish girl from Montreal doing in a place like this?

No, not in some tacky bar, but in the tiny Ontario community of Baldwin, populated by hard-working, clean cut farm folk running horse-breeding ranches.

Anita Nemtin, a graduate of Bialik High School in la belle province, is right at home in the rural outback of Ontario southeast of Lake Simcoe, living out a dream of riding finely-tuned thoroughbred jumpers in three-day events.

Last year, Nemtin, 27, reached the near-pinnacle of a rider's career when she and her horse, Kaesar, participated in the Olympic Games in Atlanta, where they finished 19th, tops among Canadians. Unfortunately, because of the sport's politics, Nemtin was forced to compete for Hungary, of which her mother is a citizen.

For Nemtin and Kaesar, it was their first Olympic Games and Nemtin admits to having been a little overwhelmed by the experience. (Kaesar had no comment.)

"I learned a lot from it," she says. "Hopefully next time, I'll be 18 places better."

Nemtin's performance improved day by day during the three-day event, which includes dressage (fancy footwork for horses), cross-country racing (the famed English steeplechase) and show jumping.

Nemtin was 30th after dressage, 20th after cross-country and 19th after the jump event.

Kaesar was a little nervous during the dressage, which requires a rider to put the horse through a complicated series of manoeuvres to display the horse's obedience and suppleness. Kaesar sensed the intensity of the spectators surrounding the dressage ring and didn't perform as well as he might have, Nemtin says.

Since Atlanta, Nemtin and Kaesar have continued to compete in a variety of events and Nemtin is setting her sights on participating in the Open European Championships to be held in England in September. She hopes to continue to improve and compete in the Sydney Olympics — this time for Canada.

The run-up to the '96 Games left Nemtin disappointed. She would have loved to compete for Canada and she felt she merited inclusion on the team. From the time she acquired Kaesar in 1992, they had made tremendous strides together. By 1994, they were competing in intermediate level international events and together won Checkmate, a three-day event at Feversham, Ont. Nemtin was Ontario champion and named leading lady rider in the province.

In that same year, riding Murphy's Law, her first horse, she finished sixth at the advanced level and a year later, Kaesar qualified for that prestigious competition. In '95, they finished sixth in a competition in New York, sixth at Bromont, Que., and first at a competition at Grandview, held in Orillia.

Having qualified for the Olympics in '95, Nemtin and Kaesar went on to the Olympic trials in Kentucky, finishing second and later finishing fifth at a Massachusetts trial.

Canadian organizers "long-listed" Nemtin and wanted her to compete in one more pre-Olympic event. "But that would have taken too much out of the horse" and Nemtin declined.

Instead she competed for Hungary. Ironically, of the 12 members of the Canadian team, five were not native Canadians, she said.

Although she chooses her words carefully, Nemtin believes the fact she's generally outspoken and doesn't know enough of the right people cost her a spot on the Olympic team.

Nevertheless, she's dedicating herself to continuing her ascent up the three-day event ladder, not exactly a standard career choice for someone who attended the Jewish People's Peretz School and Bialik. In fact, Nemtin believes she "was the only person in Bialik history who didn't continue on to college or university."

Her choice of an equestrian career didn't exactly get the ringing endorsement of her parents, Sydney and Marianne, either. Neither of them has any background in horses, though when Anita was 12, they took her for her first trail ride near their summer cottage in Stowe, Vt.

Anita Nemtin and her thoroughbred, Kaesar.

She later attended a horse camp for four weeks near Stowe, getting riding lessons in English style and learning about the care of horses.

"I was afraid at the beginning," but that quickly changed. Her love of animals and her competitive nature pushed her on.

She went on to attend a series of riding camps in Ontario, Quebec, Bermuda and the United States over the next few summers and supplemented that with local winter rides.

"At the time, my friends didn't understand. They thought it was smelly and shoveling manure."

At 17, Nemtin decided to make horses her career. She got a job training and competing horses and eventually bought Murphy's Law, a thoroughbred. He was aptly named: one day after she acquired him, things went rum as he pulled up lame. Luckily it was just a bruised foot and riding Murphy's Law, she moved up to the advanced level of competition.

"I learned with him. I moved up the ranks with my horse," she said.

In 1992, she put together a syndicate to buy Kaesar, a Mexican thoroughbred that started his life as a racehorse. Kaesar cost $10,000, about average for three-day eventers, but upkeep and competition expenses run about $30,000 per year. It'll cost $15,000 alone to ship Kaesar to England for the European championships, considered the premier event of the year.

To make ends meet and to finance other competitions, Nemtin rides and trains horses for the Hepworths, an English couple who own Leacock Hills Stables, where Kaesar is quartered. She also rides, trains and competes 10 horses at King's Windy Fields, a farm owned by Michael Loew and she gives riding lessons.

It's not exactly a run-of-the-mill lifestyle for a nice Jewish girl from Montreal, but for someone who loves horses, what could be better?

Gymnasts haul in medals

TORONTO — Athletes laden with medals recently returned home from the Luau Cup in Vancouver, among them two Jewish girls from the Vaughan Gymnastics Club.

In the midget 1 category for athletes aged nine and 10, Emily Iseman of Thornhill placed first overall while in the tyro 2 category for girls aged 11 and 12, Jaclyn Kerbel of Thornhill placed second overall.

Iseman, 10, posted a first place finish in vault, a second in bars, a second in beam and a fifth in floor exercises for a total score of 29.500, .4 better than the second place finisher.

Kerbel's best score, meanwhile, was a second place finish in bars. A fourth in vault, a sixth in floor exercises and a 10th place finish in beam gave the 11-year-old 31.2 points, good for a tie for second, .750 points behind the gold medalist.

The Inside Back

'A refreshing breeze from the tropics'

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Purimshpiel about a Hebrew sect on the paradise island of Saduka in the South Pacific has had some surprising results.

Three articles by congregation member Sidney Midgen, 66, in the Temple Emanu-El bulletin, poking gentle fun at some Jewish rituals, were taken seriously by some members of the temple and by a CBC TV news program.

The "B'nai Gands," the Hebrew sect in question, whose members practice polygamy and combine the rituals of bar mitzvah (at age 15) and chasseneh (wedding), exist only in the imagination of Midgen, director of customer operations for Novapharm.

Midgen said he imagined a gentler, easier life in the Polynesian Islands after the death of his mother in England last year.

"I was feeling down at the time, and the B'nai Gands became real to me. Their way of life, free of a lot of stress, appealed to me."

Most readers of the temple bulletin accepted the articles as a Purim story, but a few were not happy about being hoodwinked.

"One member had a brother in New Zealand who runs a crop dusting service and she asked him to fly out and locate the island," Midgen said.

"Another one wanted to take up a collection to organize food parcels for them. Still another was on business in Los Angeles and asked the Israeli consul there to get information about Saduka. He was angry when Tel Aviv answered they could find no record of it."

Midgen used the device of having his mythical friends, Carol and David Marcus of Auckland, New Zealand, write him letters about the uncharted island they "found."

"We were met by Rabbi Chaim Madzel, the fourth generation of rabbinic Madzels to minister in the South Pacific," their letters said. "He traces his roots to Grodzinska, a Polish village where the family operated a bakery and taught cartography. Rabbi Madzel is a young-looking 53 with seven children and — wait for it — two wives."

In the Purimshpeil vein, they said the Gands' Torah was translated into Saduli by Rabbi Madzel's great-grandfather, Rabbi Ur Madzel, and sent to New Zealand, where a group of Jewish businessmen had 600 copies reproduced. Reproduction of the Torah was not considered a transgression as it was in Saduli, not Hebrew.

A real Purimshpiel

The Marcuses were told, so the story goes, that one cleric, since defrocked, officiated at multiple marriages on Saduka for fees ranging from 20 chickens to 100 fish, but the Gands chased him off the island.

All members of the sect, in this idealized life, had to give some of their goods to the rabbi, attend Sabbath services on a compulsory basis and in practising tzedakah, pledge victuals and clothing to those in need.

The Marcuses asked whether the islanders marry non-Gands and were told that some of them do stray to neighboring islands to select a spouse, but Rabbi Madzel refused to officiate. Thus, the rate of intermarriage is low, according to this tongue-in-cheek account.

Midgen said Temple Emanu-El's Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld "was a party to the joke" and welcomed the articles published in the dead of winter as a "refreshing breeze from the tropics."

Midgen convinced some members of the temple to pose for pictures showing primitive tools used by the sect and a few of these were published with the articles.

"Rabbi Bielfeld asked me to expand the articles, perhaps in the form of a book, and I'm toying with the idea," Midgen said.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

My husband and I are celebrating our 40th anniversary. We are going on a cruise for two weeks. My mother is 89 years old and although she is somewhat confused, she manages to live alone. No one will be here to monitor her. She is uncomfortable with strangers. Have you any suggestions? I am very nervous.

HL

Dear HL,

There are options. Perhaps, you would introduce your mother to a homecare worker before your trip. If she participates in the interview, you will be able to judge the interaction between them. If it works, you might be able to negotiate telephone contact as well as suitable time slots for visits. An alternative is for your mom to have a vacation at the same time. There are senior residences in many cities, that are available for short stays.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Swiss list published

Praise is muted pending full disclosure

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last week's decision by the Zurich-based Swiss Bankers Association (SBA) to publish a list of dormant bank account holders on an Internet site and in newspapers around the world, has been welcomed by Canada's Jewish community as a step in the right direction.

But praise for the move was tempered by observations that a complete list has yet to be published and that Swiss banks had acted belatedly.

In a related development, the former national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Irving Abella, called for a full-fledged investigation into allegations that Portugal and the Swiss National Bank had laundered looted Nazi gold through the Bank of Canada.

And in a letter to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, Toronto lawyer Sergio Karas suggested the formation of a royal commission to study Canada's dealings with Swiss banks before and during World War II. Karas represents 31 families of Holocaust survivors and victims seeking unclaimed dormant funds in Swiss banks.

In a dramatic break with Swiss banking secrecy laws, the SBA placed newspaper advertisements in 27 countries, including Canada and Israel, listing 1,872 names linked to 1,756 accounts. All the persons on the list, Jews and non-Jews, are non-Swiss. A much longer list of dormant accounts, held by Swiss citizens and residents, will be released in October.

Without the accrued interest, the current value of the 1,756 accounts is 60.2 million Swiss francs, or roughly C$55million. Until last week, Swiss banks claimed that they were in possession of 775 dormant accounts valued at about C$41.4million.

The list carries the names of several Canadians, and also includes such figures as Adolf Hitler's personal photographer, Heinrich Hoffman; Adolf Eichmann's aide, Anton Burger (who assumed the alias of Willi Bauer); Hans Wendland, a German who is said to have looted works of art in France and Italy; the late Slovakian war criminal Vojtech Tuka, who sent thousands of Jews to concentration

Triumph of games tempered by tragedy

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Maccabi Canada (MC) officials say a special kinship between the Canadian and Australian teams played a key role in getting the Aussies to remain at the Maccabiah Games following the tragic bridge collapse at Ramat Gan stadium that killed two and injured scores of others.

Leonard Wolman, a member of MC's executive, and National Athletic Committee chair Bob Luxenberg were standing with the rest of the Canadian team and special guests – including honorary chefs de mission Jean Béliveau and Charles Bronfman, and Canadian ambassador David Berger – within 100 metres of the bridge when it caved in just before 8 p.m. on July 14.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Canadian Jewish Studies

ST. JOHN'S — The Association for Canadian Jewish Studies recently held its annual meeting here on the campus of Memorial University of Newfoundland. It was a two-day conference which also featured a special production of The Failure, a new Canadian play by Arnold Bennett based on the poetry of A.M. Klein

The conference was made possible through the sponsorship of the Beth El Congregation of Newfoundland, the Atlantic Jewish Council and the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies.

March of Living

MONTREAL — Barry Rishikof has been appointed as the Canadian chair of the 1998 March of the Living.

Rishikof, a participant in several Marches, chaired Montreal's March of the Living program in 1994.

Holocaust and Hope

TORONTO — Nineteen Canadian high-school students from a variety of ethnic and religious backgrounds left recently for a Holocaust and Hope study tour in Israel. The pilot project, co-sponsored by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada and Canadian Friends of Massuah is based on a similar League program for educators.

Hear O Israel

KELOWNA — The Okanagan Jewish community, together with the Kelowna Museum, has launched a new exhibit entitled Hear O Israel.

The exhibit includes religious artifacts dealing with services, holidays and festivals. The Okanagan Jewish community and its members contributed to the exhibit in many forms, including their own personal collection of artwork and artifacts.

Protesting Sentence

TORONTO — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre last week called on Italian Justice Minister Giovani Maria Flick to take legal steps to ensure that convicted Nazi war criminal Erich Priebke will serve a full 15-year sentence for his role in the Ardeatine Caves massacre during World War II.

An Italian military court found Priebke guilty of taking part in the murders of 335 men and boys but reduced his sentence from 15 years to five. Prosecutors had sought a life sentence for Priebke, 83.

David Matas, senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada referred to the sentence as a "mockery of justice."

ISRAEL

Yad Vashem Expansion

JERUSALEM — Israeli-born architect Moshe Safdie, who designed Habitat '67 and the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull, Que., has been chosen to design the expansion and renovation of the museum complex and entrance plaza at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

Yad Vashem says the cost of the project is estimated at over $20 million. The government of Israel and the Claims Conference, which oversees claims for restitution from Holocaust survivors, have agreed to finance part of the cost.

WORLD

Forbes' List

MOSCOW — Two Russian Jewish tycoons were listed by Forbes magazine as the nation's richest people.

Boris Berezovsky, a businessman-turned-politician, cracked the top 100 of the magazine's annual list of the world's wealthiest individuals. He was ranked in the 97th spot, with an accumulated wealth of $3 billion.

Streisand Appointment

CHICAGO — Barbra Streisand has been appointed as honorary chair of the Hadassah-sponsored International Research Institute on Jewish Women at Brandeis University.

Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, established the institute, the first of its kind, with a multi-million dollar commitment at its 83rd national convention earlier this month.

JTS Gets New Provost

NEW YORK — Dr. Jack Wertheimer, whose research and writings have made him a leading voice of contemporary Judaism and the Conservative movement, has been chosen as the next provost of the Jewish Theological Seminary.

Buenos Aires Memorial

LOS ANGELES — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Museum of Tolerance was the site of a memorial service on July 18 to mark the third anniversary of the terrorist bombing of the Jewish community building in Buenos Aires.

Eighty-six men, women and children were killed in the blast. Argentine authorities have failed to solve the case and are now considering closing their unsuccessful investigation of the 1992 terrorist bombing of the Israeli embassy, which left 27 dead.

The memorial service included participation of religious leaders and a representative of the Argentine Jewish community.

Anti-Semitism Decreasing

NEW YORK — Anti-Semitism is down around the world, according to the latest survey issued by the American Jewish Committee and the London-based Institute for Jewish Policy Research.

The study, which included an analysis of 60 countries, found that in most cases, anti-Semitism is a small threat to Jewish existence, but that several countries need careful monitoring, including several eastern European countries. Moreover, some degree of increased anti-Semitic activity was found in Argentina, Australia, France, Greece, Slovakia, Sweden and Belgium.

CD Calls For Death of Jews

BERN — A new compact disc calling for the murder of Jews is in circulation in the skinhead communities of Germany, Austria and Switzerland.

German prosecutors have launched an investigation of extreme rightists who are suspected of having distributed the disc. Anti-Jewish material is banned in Germany.

Branson to become ambulatory care centre

Will primarily serve the elderly

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — North York Branson Hospital will be given a new lease on life as an ambulatory care centre, primarily for the care of elderly patients.

Its inpatients will be moved to three other hospitals by the end of 1999.

Branson was originally scheduled to be shut down along with 11 other Metro hospitals, but this was reversed in the final decision of the Health Services Restructuring Commission (HSRC). No appeal of its ruling is allowed.

"We are quite pleased. This community needs this kind of service," said Branson president and CEO Jack Gallop.

The present site of Branson Hospital will be retained as an ambulatory care centre, but the centre itself will be managed by the North York General Hospital (NYGH).

The decision to keep Branson primarily for the care of the elderly was welcomed by NYGH president and CEO Murray MacKenzie.

He hopes that in the future, a shuttle bus will run patients and visitors between the two hospitals. The hospital already picks up some geriatric patients at home and this service will be extended to Branson patients.

A donor has offered to pay for a Jewish chapel at NYGH, he said, and "we expect the Seventh Day Adventists to play an important part in running the centre.

"Numerous physicians from Branson have applied to come to NYGH and we welcome them and many non-medical staff who we expect will come here as well."

The new Branson Hospital will include specialty clinics, outpatient mental health services, medical walk-in assessment and diagnostic services, day programs for the elderly and health promotion. The final shape of these services is yet to be determined.

UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, filed strong briefs with the HSRC urging consideration for the elderly along the Bathurst Street corridor if Branson was closed. They pointed out that this area had the fastest growing number of seniors in Metro.

Support to keep Branson as a centre for care of the elderly also came from NYGH, Humber River Regional Hospital (formerly York-Finch, Humber and Northwestern) and the Metro Hospital Council.

Branson and Humber River had proposed that they run the Branson ambulatory care centre, but the commission decided to hand the reins to NYGH.

There will be some "significant changes" in Branson's operation in the next 18 months, Gallop said, as a transition team will decide which outpatient services will be housed at each location — Branson, NYGH, Humber River Regional and York Central in Richmond Hill.

The team, consisting of three members from each of the above-named hospitals, will be headed by a facilitator from the commission.

Some services now at Branson may be moved away and others moved in, Gallop said.

He was delighted, he said, that the commission has allotted $4.1 million for renovations to make the ambulatory care centre a reality.

NYGH has been given $20.7 million to care for all its new patients, including obstetric patients from Branson.

The commission set the deadline of Sept. 30 this year for Branson to reach an agreement with NYGH for disposition of its inpatients to other hospitals, though the move itself has a deadline of the end of 1999.

The commission ordered that 40 percent of medical/surgical patients at Branson go to NYGH, 43 percent to Humber River Regional and 17 percent to York Central.

The disposition of obstetric patients is to be 60 percent to NYGH, 20 percent to Humber River and 20 percent to York Central. All pediatric patients must go to NYGH.

Until the transition team makes its decisions, Gallop said, it will not be known how much of Branson's physical (including medical) plant will be maintained.

The question of whether Branson will retain beds for sub-acute cases has yet to be settled, he said, noting that the commission has asked for proposals from area hospitals to provide 400 sub-acute beds in north and northwest Metro.

As well, an urgent shortage of chronic care beds for elderly patients was underlined in briefs to the commission protesting the closing of six chronic care hospitals in Metro.

The HSRC said the Branson board must pass a resolution by Aug. 31 that would prohibit the transfer of any funds and assets from the hospital foundation or any other person without the commission's approval.

The Branson board is also directed, along with all Metro hospitals, York Central and Mississauga Hospital to develop a human resources plan by Oct. 31, for the employees who will lose their jobs. This plan has to be approved by the Ontario Minister of Health and the HSRC.

In response to the recent announcement, Congress vice-chair Harold Brief and UJA Federation vice-president Alan Sandler said they "appreciated that the commission has listened to the Jewish community in its representations, and that the hospital will continue to be of service to the significant numbers of the community, especially the elderly, who live within the vicinity of the hospital."

Canada backs UN on Har Choma

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada has come under fire from national Jewish groups for supporting a United Nations resolution that condemned Israel for its Har Choma housing project.

Canada's support of the July 15 resolution "will only serve to injure an already fragile Middle East peace process," said Stephen Victor, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), in a statement.

The UN General Assembly, in a special emergency session, overwhelmingly adopted the non-binding resolution against Israel by a vote of 131-3, with 14 abstentions.

The Arab-sponsored resolution condemned Israel's decision to build a 6,500-unit housing project mainly for Jews in eastern Jerusalem's Har Choma neighborhood. The project has been a source of tension between the government of Israel and the Palestine Authority.

Voting against the resolution were Israel, the United States and Micronesia, a collection of Pacific Ocean islands.

Canada voted for the resolution "because it reflects in broad measure our concerns about the serious situation in the peace process, and the particular importance which the construction of a new settlement in [Har Choma] has had in bringing us to the critical juncture," said Canada's ambassador to the UN, Robert Fowler.

Fowler explained that Canada abstained on previous resolutions on this subject, and it is "with regret that we find it necessary" for the UN to raise the issue again "due to the absence of any positive developments in this matter."

The resolution fell short of its original intent to levy economic sanctions against Israel.

In his statement, Victor said he finds it "disturbing to see the UN hijacked by a politically motivated campaign to isolate and delegitimize Israel."

While recognizing that there is a dispute between Israel and the Palestinians over Har Choma, the General Assembly "is not the appropriate venue" for resolving it.

The CIC is "very disappointed" by Canada's support of the resolution, Victor added.

B'nai Brith Canada criticized the resolution as one-sided and biased, and claimed that Canada's support for it "can only inflame Middle East tension," said Joel Cuperfain, chair of the group's Israel affairs committee.

The 13-point resolution not only condemns Israel for Har Choma, it reaffirms that "all illegal Israeli actions in Occupied East Jerusalem and the rest of the Occupied Palestinian Territory...cannot be recognized, irrespective of the passage of time."

Fowler said Canada "is deeply concerned" about the "absence of negotiations" on the peace front, and repeated Ottawa's long-held view that it does not recognize "permanent Israeli control" over the territories captured in 1967.

Fowler called on both sides to honor the Olso accords, and said there should be "a determined effort by the Palestinian leadership to combat violence and terrorism."

In a statement, Israel's Foreign Ministry said the country "utterly rejects this one-sided and hostile resolution," and said the Har Choma project "does not, by any criterion, constitute a threat to international peace and security."

Over the past 15 years, Canada's voting pattern at the UN appears to have tilted toward a European perspective on the Arab-Israeli conflict, rather than an American one, observed David Goldberg, director of research at the Toronto-based Foundation for Middle East Studies.

The July 15 resolution came in response to recent findings issued by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan that Israel had failed to stop construction of the Har Choma project.

Lawyer ran boys club

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Carl Keyfetz, a Toronto-born lawyer long involved in many facets of the Jewish community, died recently at Baycrest Hospital. He was 89.

Obituary

Probably his most rewarding involvement was as a director of the Jewish Boys Club of Toronto in the late 1920s, he said in a 1990 interview for The Osgoode Society's oral history program.

Within a year or two after the club's formation, delinquency among Jewish youth dropped dramatically, he recalled. The club was a beneficiary of the United Jewish Welfare Fund, a forerunner of United Jewish Appeal.

A co-founder of Ontario's first Jewish boy scout troop as a teenager, Keyfetz later became involved in B'nai Brith, Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and numerous other organizations, but always retained his affiliation with the scout troop.

He also served on the boards of Jewish Family and Child Service, Jewish Immigrant Aid Society and Beth Tzedec Congregation.

The son of Russian immigrants who married in Toronto, Keyfetz graduated from Osgoode Hall in 1930 and practised law until the mid-1980s, well after a progressive disability made it necessary for him to use a wheelchair. He was appointed a Queen's Counsel in 1951.

"He enjoyed every day he was at the office," said Pearle Keyfetz, his wife of 34 years. "He loved being a lawyer. That kept him going, even when he had difficulty getting there and would use Wheel-Trans."

Keyfetz put his legal skills to use in over 100 court martials when he was in the Royal Canadian Air Force during World War II. A life member of General Wingate Branch No. 256 (Ontario) of the Royal Canadian Legion, he also was honorary national commander and judge advocate for the Jewish War Veterans of Canada and legal counsel for the Canadian Hemophilia Society.

A staunch Conservative, Keyfetz was active in political circles and once served as campaign manager for John Bassett when he ran for mayor of Toronto.

He continued to follow political news with avid interest after moving into Baycrest ten years ago. No stranger to the institution, he was a former longtime chair of its admissions committee.

"He was a people person," said Pearle Keyfetz. "Any involvement with the public was like a tonic for him. I think that was the secret of his success in so many areas."

Keyfetz is survived by his wife Pearle, daughter Penny Benjamin, six grandchildren, and siblings Ben of Hollywood, Florida, and Theresa Jacobs of Buffalo, New York. Son Stephen Norris and five siblings predeceased him.

Alleged Nazi won't fight loss of citizenship

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —An alleged Nazi war criminal has unexpectedly withdrawn his opposition to government efforts to strip him of his citizenship.

In a formal notice filed in Federal Court recently, Ladislaus Csizsik-Csatary stated he would not seek a court reference on the citizenship question. His decision opens the door for federal Citizenship and Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard to recommend to cabinet that Csizsik-Csatary be stripped of his citizenship, without having to prove in court he obtained it by fraud.

Loss of citizenship would be followed by deportation proceedings to remove him from the country.

Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit, said "it was unexpected that he drop the case" after filing a summary of fact and evidence outlining his version of wartime events.

Federal officials allege that Csizsik-Csatary lied when he immigrated to Canada in 1949 and again when he obtained Canadian citizenship in 1955.

They claim he served as an officer in the Royal Hungarian Police in Kassa, Hungary (now Kosice, Slovak Republic) in March 1944. During the time the town's Jews were forced into ghettos, he "had an office in the ghetto headquarters. He had the authority to determine whether certain individuals were exempt from anti-Jewish measures. His position was 'commander of the ghetto'."

In a fact situation eerily reminiscent of the Imre Finta case, government officials allege that in April 1944 Jews from the ghetto and elsewhere were transferred to a brickyard on the outskirts of Kassa by the Royal Hungarian Police.

"At the brickyard camp, Jews lived in inhumane conditions, with inadequate shelter, food and sanitary facilities. Those who tried to escape were shot and killed. The Royal Hungarian Gendarmerie and the Police guarded the camp," court documents allege.

Government documents also contend Csizsik-Csatary "visited the brickyard camp on a number of occasions and was one of the senior officers in a position of authority at the camp."

They also allege that Csizsik-Csatary was present at least twice when Jews were loaded onto rail transports bound for Auschwitz and other camps, and that of the 12,000 Jews who had been gathered in the brickyard, fewer than 500 survived the war.

The documents claim Csizsik-Csatary "transferred custody to the Germans of several Jews who had been in hiding and had evaded the mass deportations. According to his own police reports, [Csizsik-Csatary] transferred the Jews to the Germans 'for the purposes of deportations.'"

After the war, the documents go on, Csizsik-Csatary, who was sentenced to death in absentia by a People's Court in Kosice, passed himself off as being born in Yugoslavia.

In his own summary of facts, Csizsik-Csatary, 82, admits he "played a limited role in the movement of Jews to the ghetto and no part whatsoever in their subsequent deportation." He denied having authority to exempt anyone from anti-Jewish measures but he admits that in June and July 1944, he transferred, under orders, several Jews who had been in hiding in Kassa to the Germans, though he did not know where they were to be sent.

Csizsik-Csatary downplayed his role as commander of the ghetto, saying it was "with respect to this small Jewish ghetto in the city and only in his capacity as assistant" to the police chief.

He claims he changed his name because of "false accusations" against him and out of fear for his safety and that of his family. He says he "inadvertently" claimed his hometown was in Yugoslavia and he said he was unaware of the Hungarian death sentence against him until informed of it in 1995 by a government lawyer.

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said "the government should move as quickly as possible to strip him of his citizenship and get him out of the country."

Vickery said even if stripped of his citizenship, Csizsik-Csatary could still contest the deportation on humanitarian or other grounds. If he fails, he could be deported to the country from which he came to Canada, or to Hungary or to any country that would accept him.

Service groups help JWI head develop new skills

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Anna Lee Gould, newly installed president of Jewish Women International (JWI) of Canada credits the organization with having helped her to develop the skills needed to raise a child who has special needs.

"Through my involvement [in raising funds for] the Residential Treatment Centre (RTC) in Jerusalem, a centre sponsored by JWI North America and the Israeli government that offers a drug-free program for emotionally disturbed boys, I became aware that such treatment did exist for special needs children. This allowed me to take a pragmatic approach in my daughter's upbringing."

Moral support was also high when her daughter, now 13, was born, she says. "They respected the time out I took to be with my family and welcomed me back when I was ready to return to the organization," says Gould, who has two other children, a son, 21 and a daughter, 4.

The support she received, she says, made her realize that "women need to share with each other. They need to prioritize time that is just for themselves. When they come out to meetings, all other ties slip into the background for a while and they take part in something that is not necessarily task oriented. It is energizing. Women involved in something outside the family become fuller — more complete. I believe that their families benefit from this."

Belonging to a service organization, Gould says, provides a woman with "skills she would not hone anywhere else. Through our leadership skills department, women learn communication skills, self-confidence and about group dynamics. Even a well-educated woman may not have the confidence to become a leader. There is definitely a place to learn within the volunteer context and this knowledge can be carried over into the workplace.

"I have gained confidence in my public speaking, learned to understand people, learned how to delegate and motivate and even how to deal with certain family situations — not to mention the good friends I have made."

Gould, who joined JWI (then B'nai Brith Women) 20 years ago, says that the organization has changed in that time "to suit the needs of today's women. We recognize that women are different than they were even five years ago. Their free time is scarce, yet they still want a Jewish connection. To that end, members can become as involved as they wish. We even offer a general membership in which a woman may become involved in a specific program, but not attend regular meetings."

Part of her mandate in her two years of office, she says, is to provide programming that "suits every woman. Through our programs such as action and advocacy we hope to attract women at all ages and stages."

Tragedy hits tourists

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holiday trips turned to tragedy as three Israeli tourists were killed in two unrelated accidents in Alberta recently.

In the first, a 26-year-old Israeli died after falling off a cliff into a waterfall in Jasper National Park. In the other accident, two women were killed when the car in which they were passengers crossed a median and flipped near the town of Morley.

The bodies were flown to Israel for funeral services.

In both cases, the Jewish communities of Calgary and Edmonton, including the Chevra Kadisha, provided moral support and other assistance to the families of the victims, said Irit Waidergorn, vice-consul at Israel's Toronto consulate.

She said Alon Henig, who was travelling in Alberta with his girlfriend, died when he slipped on a wet rock near a waterfall while posing for a photograph. The Edmonton Journal reported that Henig and his girlfriend had left a designated trail area.

In the other accident, Ruth Cohen of Kiryat Ono and Malka Nahmias of Hadera were riding in the back seat of a car that went out of control on the Trans-Canada Highway between Banff and Calgary.

Their husbands, Asaf Cohen and Asher Nahmias, were taken to Foothills Hospital but their lives were not in danger.

Cpl. Bruce McFarlane of Cochrane RCMP said neither woman was wearing a seat-belt when the accident occurred. His investigation showed that the car drifted off the paved portion of the highway to the grassy shoulder. The driver then oversteered the car back to the highway and realizing he had over-compensated, oversteered again, losing control.

Both women "came out of the vehicle" when it rolled. The men were wearing seatbelts and received only minor injuries, he said.

The couples were returning to Calgary after visiting the Rockies and were scheduled to continue their trip to Alaska, McFarlane said.

Demonstrators march outside Kalejs' residence

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For three residents of a North York condominium building, the demonstration to protest the presence there of war criminal Konrads Kalejs could not have come too soon.

"Jews in the building are giving up," said Vera Peter, a resident of the North York condo building. "Some say, 'What's the use? Why should we be doing anything?'"

When asked how they feel about Kalejs' presence, Jewish people in the building "roll their eyes and say, 'What's the use? He'll be here until he dies,'" said Rhonda Pasternack, a resident in the same building.

Pasternack, Peter and Imre Smith, three Jewish residents of the condominium building at 5444 Yonge Street, were among the 120 demonstrators who marched and chanted against Kalejs' presence there. The rally was the second in a series organized by Generation to Generation, Children of Holocaust Survivors, a group that targets alleged Nazi war criminals. The first was held about a month ago outside the Burlington home of Juozas Kisielaitis, who moved to Canada in 1985 after U.S. authorities confronted him with allegations about his involvement in a Lithuanian killing unit.

Kalejs also left the United States, ultimately ending up in Canada after a court found him guilty of participating in wartime atrocities as a member of the Arajs Kommando, a Latvian police killing unit. A citizen of Australia, Kalejs is facing possible deportation from Canada. A decision by an immigration adjudicator in his case is expected soon.

Outside the North York condo building where he resides, Holocaust survivor Imre Smith was clearly agitated at Kalejs' presence in the building.

"I came down today and he was standing with me in the elevator. I am shaking. He's even not afraid of anything that happens to him. It's a very bad feeling. He stands beside me and I cannot do anything in the elevator."

Peter, Pasternack and Smith regularly attended Kalejs' immigration hearing, which concluded in March. Peter and Smith are both Holocaust survivors and the condominium building is home to many Jews, including survivors.

Outside the building,the demonstrators heard brief addresses from Mike Feldman, a North York councilman, Len Rudner, vice-chair of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, and Holocaust survivor Max Eisen.

Eisen recalled the "dreadful days of beatings and killings" and how volunteers massacred Jewish communities and served as concentration camp guards.

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Congress, said, "We are here to say to the Canadian government that time is of the essence. Kalejs has lived here one day too many. We want him out."

The next demonstration is planned for Wednesday, Sept. 17, at a location yet to be named.

CJC posts $5,000 reward

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress has pitched in $5,000 as part of a $27,000 reward for information leading to the arrest of the person or persons who threw a beer bottle at an Amish woman two weeks ago.

The woman, Mary Kuepfer, 22, was riding in an open buggy at 2:30 in the morning when she was hit in the face by a beer bottle, causing her cheek, lip and forehead to be badly cut. Kuepfer has been told she may need reconstructive surgery to repair the damage.

Len Rudner, Congress' vice-chair of community relations, said the reward was offered because "these are the kinds of crimes that affect Jews. We understand it as well as anybody...It has all the signs of a hate-motivated attack.

"We can't be parochial and say we'll only be concerned about attacks on us."

Police reported that a second Amish buggy, returning from the same wedding attended by Kuepfert, was also attacked with a beer bottle that night. No one was injured in that assault.

Congress has twice before offered a $5,000 reward — both times in cases involving vandalism to property. On one occasion, the reward led to the arrest and conviction of a man for desecrating a synagogue. The reward was also offered last summer after a North York home was vandalized with anti-Semitic graffiti, but no arrests were made in that case.

Marionette chorus

Two weeks ago, on July 15, the General Assembly passed a resolution condemning Israel for not abandoning the construction project on Har Choma. The vote was 131 in favor; three opposed — Israel, the United States and Micronesia — and 14 abstained.

Typical of all such General Assembly resolutions aimed at delegitimizing Israel's claims in the region, its language was extreme, loaded with the code words which have one meaning in the Arab world and an other in the west; and its content went far beyond any recognizable sense of proportion or balance. The following two paragraphs from among the 13 in the resolution are representative. "The General Assembly...

• Reaffirms that all illegal Israeli actions in Occupied East Jerusalem (our emphasis) and the rest of the Occupied Palestinian Territory, especially settlement activity, and the practical results thereof cannot be recognized irrespective of the passage of time.

• Reiterates the demands...in particular the immediate and full cessation of the construction of a new settlement at Jebel Abu Ghneim (Har Choma — our addition), to the south of Occupied East Jerusalem, and of all other Israeli settlement activities, as well as of all illegal measures and actions in Jerusalem." (our emphasis)

Canada supported the resolution. Our Ambassador to the United Nations, Robert Fowler, justified his vote in favor "because it reflects in broad measure our concerns about the serious situation in the peace process, and the particular importance which the construction of a new settlement in Jabal Abu Ghneim/Har Choma has had in bringing us to this critical juncture."

Both as logic and as tactic, Canada's support of the resolution is regrettable. Logically, it makes no sense to claim concern over the floundering peace process, as Fowler did, and then help to implement a measure which undermines it even further.

Tactically, it merely pushes the two parties farther away from the negotiations table. Intervention into the bilateral process by the UN weakens the bilateral process. Moreover, by so openly adopting the PLO's arguments and by so brazenly ignoring Israel's counterarguments, the General Assembly and those countries who supported the one-sided, manipulative resolution proved they do not understand the key component of the bilateral Oslo process is to allow the parties to develop mutual trust and confidence by requiring them to resolve their differences peacefully, reasonably through debate, discussion, negotiation and compromise.

In our view, the government of Canada deserves to be soundly criticized for falling into the PLO line, as if tugged by a string, like a marionette, singing the chorus of unfair, anti-Israel rhetoric.

Like the newly-vowed marriage under the chupah whose celebration is constrained and diminished by the crash of broken glass, so too were the celebration and the elation of the 15th Maccabiah Games. It should have been an untarnished shining monument to athleticism, camaraderie and peoplehood. But, alas, it was not. Instead its shine was diminished forever by the sorrowful engraving deep into the stone of Jewish history, of three names: Gregory Small, 37, Yetty Bennett, 50 and Elizabeth Sawicki, 47. Their deaths should have never happened. Those responsible must be brought to justice to bear the consequences.

"All kinds of vices are falsely attributed to the Jews because one wishes to convince oneself that one has a right to detest them. But the pre-existing sentiment is the detestation of the Jews."

Aish HaTorah reply to Rabbi Yitz Greenberg

I was distressed to read Rabbi Yitz Greenberg's characterization of Aish HaTorah as a contributor to divisiveness in the Jewish community. (CJN, July 3)

If anything, in our opinion, Aish HaTorah is fortifying links among Jews and breaking down walls between our people.

It would help at the outset to question Rabbi Greenberg's definitions of unity and divisiveness. From reading the contents of the interview, one would think that anyone who agrees with his outlook understands all about Jewish unity, whereas anyone who disagrees is against it.

If someone believes philosophically that everything is relative, then, of course, one can accept all standards. The trouble is that, philosophically, no one believes that.

I assume that Rabbi Greenberg has standards regarding Jewish theology that he will not compromise. If so, is he being divisive with people who hold a different view? Is the Conservative theologian divisive if he does not accept patrilineal descent as the criterion for Jewish identity? And what about Reform theologians who feel that a non-Jewish spouse should not receive an aliyah to the Torah? Are they, too, against Jewish unity because they disagree with those who advocate this innovation?

I would like to propose a different standard — one that we believe is logical, powerful and tested. The principle is: "Even though I don't necessarily agree with your ideology or politics, I don't know who the better person is in the eyes of G-d." Like a family, we must learn that we can admire and respect each other, even when we disagree.

If all Jews walked around with this mindset and exhibited it daily, we would bring authenticity to the designation, "the Jewish People." We call upon all Jews who believe that our most important goal is bringing the concept of the Jewish People to adopt this definition of unity and put it into practice.

Windsor has more than 400 Jewish families

First I want to congratulate Sharon Kroft on her election as president of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO (CJN, July 3) and wish her much success.

Secondly I want to know what Windsor she is referring to. I have lived in Windsor, Ont., for 60 years and although our Jewish population is decreasing annually, we have never been down to 100 families in the years that I have lived here.

Respect views of elders and children

As a parent and an educator, I was interested to read Elliott Malamet's column of July 3, "Parents must teach concept of morality."

Malamet makes an important point: the elders of a society have a great deal to offer in terms of having a long view and understanding the consequences of our present actions. But he ignores an equally important point: the world (including Judaism) is continually changing and it requires the new aspects that every generation brings for its very survival.

Malamet refers to The Little Prince, a favorite book of mine, but in a way that completely misrepresents its meaning. Anyone reading The Little Prince will know that it is an unmitigated celebration of the viewpoint of children, with a less-than-flattering description of "grown-ups." I couldn't let Malamet's inaccurate portrayal of the book go unchallenged; hence this letter. However, as I read the article, I realized that the reference he makes to the book gives a powerful if unintended boost to the neglected side of the argument of how to educate for the future.

According to Malamet, children must be "tamed," and by this he implies that they must learn to submit to authority and accept the moral view of their parents and teachers. But the passage in The Little Prince suggests something very different. Far from needing to be tamed, the child (the little prince) is being implored by the fox to tame him, by which he (the fox) simply means "to establish ties." The description of "taming" in the book, of the mutual, reciprocal relationship of establishing those ties and the time and understanding required to do it, seems to me as true and beautiful description of an ideal teaching-learning relationship as any I have read. It is also evocative of Martin Buber's "I-Thou" relationship.

Teaching and learning, conservation and renewal, are sometimes paradoxical and contradictory, and this seems to be suggested in the passage Malamet quotes from the Talmud. Judaism, at its core, has a relational, interactive quality that goes against dogmatism. Our truths stay vital by being debated and discussed, by being questioned and rediscovered by succeeding generations. The role of the elders, then, is not just to transfer concepts of morality to the young, but to take responsibility both for the children and for the renewal of the world, and this requires respect and valuing for what it is children bring.

We live in a world where everything is changing and where the values of the past are no longer assured or automatically accepted. This is a challenge in all areas of life, not the least in religious and moral thinking, including in Judaism. There are two basic reactions to this state of affairs, and Jews have embraced both. One is fundamentalism, the other a willingness to adapt and renew ideas. The second option is not an easy one, because it lacks certainty and risks losing some concepts and practices in their existing form. But because fundamentalism runs counter to our basic beliefs as Jews, it is the only thing we can do.

Remembering the Exodus 1947

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

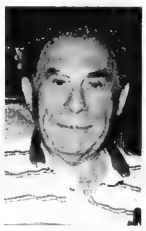
Hana Zimnowitz was married in June 1946, just a year after liberation from the Oberalstadt concentration camp in Czechoslovakia. Given the new couple's meagre resources, a honeymoon was out of the question, even though Hana longed for an ocean cruise. A year later, however, she got her wish. For Zimnowitz, today a 75-year-old widow living in Thornhill north of Toronto, the voyage of the Exodus, the little steamer that made Jewish history 50 years ago, was "[her] honeymoon cruise."

Zimnowitz spent a good portion of her "cruise" preparing for a pitched battle against British troops, who refused to allow the famed ship's 4,515 passengers to disembark in Palestine. All of those passengers, refugees from Hitler's Europe, were crammed into the ship like sardines.

"But we were young," she says. "We survived the Nazis, and now, we were on our way to Palestine. What could the British do to us?" She even goes so far as to say that parts of the trip were "fun."

For Ben Shedlezky of North York, now 80, the voyage was less amusing. He was aboard the Exodus with his wife, Eva, and their infant son, Henry. He remembers "crying, screaming, panic" when the British attacked the unarmed vessel, and was so afraid for his young family that he barricaded them into a bathroom below deck.

Of the 64 vessels that tried to smash the British blockade of Palestine from 1945 to 1948 in the clandestine operation known as Aliyah Bet, none became better known than the Exodus. Leon Uris immortalized both the ship and that period in his 1957 historical novel, Exodus, which has been translated into dozens of languages and has been read by millions. A film version starred Paul Newman. For countless readers and movie-goers, the book and the film served as an introduction to the story of modern-day Israel. For them, it was the ship that launched a nation.



Ben Shedlezky

But like many great storytellers, Uris blurred the line between truth and fiction. His Exodus succeeded in reaching Palestine with 300 refugee children after a dramatic hunger strike in Cyprus. The truth was far different.

Zimnowitz and Shedlezky experienced the real thing.

The vessel was an American ferry called the President Warfield, after the founder of the shipping line that built her. Licensed to carry 400 passengers, she was built in 1928 and bought in 1946 by a company in Baltimore fronting for Aliyah Bet. Repaired and overhauled, she was registered at first to Panama. When the British pressured Panama to withdraw its registration, the boat flew the flag of Honduras.

After a series of cloak-and-dagger manoeuvres, the Warfield made its way to the French port of Sete, across the Bay of Lyons from Marseilles. British intelligence, however, was aware of her and followed her the entire time.

In the summer of 1947, Shedlezky was recovering from his wartime experiences, which included a two-year stint in a German prison and two years in the Polish army. While in a displaced persons camp in Germany, he was approached by a leader of the Irgun, one of the post-war Jewish underground groups, and told about the Warfield's plan to sneak Jewish immigrants into Palestine.

"We were told to leave everything behind," says Shedlezky, now a grandfather of six. "We could only take five kilos [of belongings] each. Then, for two days and two nights, we went on trucks to France."

Once in Sete, the men, he says, were told to stay on the decks, while the women and children were taken to the holds below, which had been emptied of all fittings. At first, the atmosphere was joyous and optimistic.

To get on the Warfield, "you had to have some kind of shlep [influence]," says Zimnowitz. Her husband Meir did, having been a leader in Betar, the Zionist youth movement. The couple travelled on trucks and in trains for several days before arriving on the scenic French coast for the trip. "No one was scared," she recalls. "We were happy to go to Palestine."

But only one day after the Warfield had slipped away from the French coast, a British destroyer appeared on the horizon and demanded the Warfield identify herself and state her intentions. With each passing day, the number of British ships chasing the Warfield increased, and so did the concern of the passengers. Everyone knew a confrontation was imminent. The mainly American volunteer crew rigged wire mesh around the deck and openings, and passengers prepared makeshift weapons with any material available: canned food, iron bars, even hot steam and oil. It was Zimnowitz's job to wrap barbed wire around potatoes for use as projectiles.

"We knew what was coming," she says. "But no one was worried. We came from concentration camps. We knew the British wouldn't kill us. At worst, we thought they would take us to Cyprus."

In the early hours of July 18, 1947, with the Warfield just 40 kilometres from the coast of Palestine, the British attacked. But overnight, the ship had changed her name. A banner now proclaimed her as Haganah Ship — Exodus 1947.

The battle was fierce. "They rammed us and made holes in the ship," remembers Zimnowitz. "Then, there was panic. Smoke came from the electrical room, and we started to leak oil and drinking water."

A strong swimmer, Zimnowitz thought of jumping overboard. "People were running everywhere and screaming, 'Fire!'"

Only a few metres away, Shedlezky was carrying out his orders: to cut the ropes supporting the Warfield's lifeboats, which the British were using to climb aboard. After he did, the troops "hit the water."

The fighting lasted only a few hours, but the British killed two and wounded 146 Jews. The damaged Exodus was towed into Haifa's harbor, where passengers were loaded onto three British prison ships.

The rumor was that the boats would be escorted to Cyprus, but instead, they set back out to France and anchored off Port de Bouc. The French government refused to force anyone off and a three-week standoff with the British ensued.

"It was fun, not scary," Zimnowitz insists. She helped scrawl a huge banner, in lipstick on a bedsheet, declaring "Down With Bevin." Ernest Bevin was the hated British foreign secretary at the time.

Despite a hunger strike staged by many of the adults on board, officials in London made good on their threat to return the passengers to British-controlled DP camps in Germany. The survivors of Nazi camps "weren't happy" — to say the least — about returning to the land of Hitler, Zimnowitz says. Passengers were carried off the ships in Hamburg "kicking, screaming and spitting," and taken to closed-off army barracks. But the plight of these Jews caught the world's attention and ultimately played a part in persuading Britain to hand the matter of Palestine to the United Nations.

Eventually, in 1948, both Zimnowitz and Shedlezky made it to Israel, just months following independence. Shedlezky came to Canada in 1953 and plied his trade as a butcher. His infant son Henry is now a teacher in Hamilton.

Zimnowitz and her husband came to Canada in 1965. Today, she keeps busy with hiking and canoeing. "I was always one for adventure," she says with a smile. "And the Exodus was an adventure."

This year's Holocaust Education Week in the Greater Toronto Area will open Oct. 30 at the Leah Posluns Theatre with a program on the Exodus. The Holocaust Education Committee (416-635-2883, ext. 144) is seeking any passengers of the ship who live in the Toronto region.

In Montreal, the Holocaust Memorial Centre will conduct Holocaust Education Week from March 23 to 30, 1998. The core of the week's programs, called Meeting the Future Through Knowledge of the Past, is sponsored by the Kleinman Family Foundation's annual CEGEP symposium.

A descent into fast food hell

By Viva Press in Jerusalem

For me, Kentucky Fried Chicken (KFC) was the final straw. First there was McDonalds, then Pizza Hut, Burger King, Sbarros, Dunkin Donuts, Second Cup. And now, KFC.

The once quaint downtown promenade area of Jerusalem has been overtaken by huge international fast food chain conglomerates. Where before tourists used to come to Ben Yehuda Street to see authentic Israeli-style living, now tourists who still flock there see an area depleted of anything truly Israeli.

The Ben Yehuda area has turned into a food court — albeit an open-air one — that you would expect to find in a large North-American shopping mall.

The Israelis who used to sit in the small personalized cafes have moved elsewhere.

And who can blame them?

When a storefront is not occupied by a food chain, there are T-shirt stores selling clothing with catchy tourist phrases proving you were in Israel.

Also present on the Ben Yehuda strip are "American ice-cream" places and bagel shops.

Come to think of it, Ben Yehuda Street isn't the only street that has been colonized.

Near every town and city, a fast food chain reigns. From north to south, east to west, in every nook and cranny, no matter where you are in this country you can get fast food. When you drive along the highway, the golden arches seem to be following you, or rather leading the way.

Make no mistake — when I say fast food I'm referring to American-style fast food. The falafel and shwarma are the Israeli fast food that's particular to Israel.

But these places are much quieter — in the esthetic sense. Falafel places rarely have loud and bold-colored signs announcing that you're " only a two-minute walk" from their location.

Quite the opposite. The falafel place often occupies a small storefront area or kiosk. It still is the "bona fide" Israeli fast food.

And then there's supposed to be something special about the capital city, Jerusalem. Something different from the rest of the country.

But its downtown core is nothing more than a meeting place of fast food giants.

When I do go to Ben Yehuda Street, I feel I have crossed the border. There is more English spoken there than elsewhere. If I didn't live here, I'd wonder where all the Israelis had gone.

But I know where the Israelis are. Since I've resided here a number of times, I know which restaurants and cafes the authentic Israelis frequent. However, I won't disclose these places because I don't want to be blamed for ruining another favorite hangout spot.

I know that some people still like Ben Yehuda Street. Yet I can't stop thinking what the man himself would say ,were he alive today.

Here we had a man who was criticized for speaking to his son only in Hebrew. Eliezer Ben Yehuda dreamed that one day Hebrew would become the official language of Israel, that everyone would speak Hebrew.

But at the heart of the city, in the downtown core that everyone has to pass through at some time or another, there, standing mighty and proud, are places Ben Yehuda would surely have abhorred. His dream of a Hebrew-speaking Jewish state could not have included fast food chains taking over the capital city.

Then again, maybe I'm being a little too harsh. After all, Kentucky Fried Chicken here is kosher.

Action turns idealism into reality

By Justin Korda in Jerusalem

This summer in Israel I have found myself with several different groups of activists. I have spent time with followers of the late Shlomo Carlebach, people who in the '60s were protesters against the U.S. government's involvement in the Vietnam War. I have sat with ex-students who lobbied numerous institutions in the '70s for the release of Soviet Jewry from the oppressing Communist regime. And I have met others, who, in the '80s, brought the subject of Ethiopian Jewry to the top of the list of Jewish concerns, whose intervention eventually led to the airlift of that community to Israel.

It seems as though every generation has had its struggles and its accomplishments. I listened in fascination to the miraculous stories of how, in their youth, these people made decisions and took the measures to realize their dreams. This always made me think about what trademark my generation is going to leave. What is our struggle? What are we going to accomplish? And then, before I could even pinpoint one of the serious causes that our generation could be working towards, I began to wonder about something that to me is the most troubling of all: Where is our generation?

This generation is definitely not blessed with a world that is free of problems; it is, therefore, not a lack of causes that is silencing us. Perhaps apathy is what plagues us.

As a student myself, I have had to listen to countless people utter the cliche that goes something like this: "Oh you're so young and idealistic. Wait until you get older and you will see that things are not so simple." Now I must admit, I realize that my response to this piece of advice is biased. However, I hope and pray that as long as I live, I will never give the biased response to that particular remark. I don't feel that there is anything wrong with being idealistic, as long as this idealism is realistic. For an idealistic belief can be the most powerful force when it is reflected in action. Perhaps the students of my generation have listened too diligently to this advice given by our elders and as a result, have lost their enthusiasm.

The immigration of over a half-million Soviet Jews to Israel and the airlift of the Ethiopian Jewish community was once an idealistic dream. To some people, these dreams were even thought of as ridiculous and not worth the effort. Fortunately, the idealists did not relent when they were told to "get serious," and their idealism was reflected in realistic action. They did not sit around and talk about how much they wished for their dream to come true; they picked up their pens and wrote letters, they dialed their telephones and pressured, and they stood up to march and demonstrate. In time, the dream became a reality.

Seeking the freedom of the four missing Israeli soldiers, improving the quality of life of the 20 percent of Jews in Montreal who live in poverty, working to end the hatred that exists between religious and secular Jews in Israel, bringing Nazi war criminals living freely in Canada to justice and contributing to a future that is assured with the continuation of vibrant Jewish communities are just a few possible current dreams. Unfortunately, as if it were not obvious, merely believing in these causes will do nothing to realize them. Only an active approach that involves translating a belief into tachlis, or action, will bring about the desired changes. This has been proven many times before. Hopefully it will be proven again.

The ability to believe in a cause with all of one's heart is a true gift that human beings, and especially youth, possess. However, we also possess another gift — the ability to act. To use one gift without complementing it with the other is simply a futile endeavor. But using both gifts in tandem to turn an intangible idea into concrete reality is to make a difference, to make dreams come true.

I recently heard an anecdote about a poor man who decided to take his troubles up with G-d. He went to Western Wall, pressed his face up against the stones and cried to the creator, "Please G-d, I have so many children to support and I don't have any money. Please let me win the lottery. I know it is a big request, but I promise that I will use all the money to help my family and myself better serve you." The man then turned around and began to walk away. All of sudden a heavenly voice descended to the man saying, "Why don't you buy a ticket?"

This story has tremendous meaning. We complain about the world's problems and desperately hope for changes, yet we fail to look at the most obvious and powerful place to bring about change — ourselves. Our idealistic beliefs must be combined with activism if we are ever to see our dreams come true.

Concerning the State of Israel, David Ben-Gurion once said that "reality includes all possible miracles." Let us begin to realize our dreams and let us never stop dreaming.

Finding heroes other than boxers

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I must confess that I was disinterested in the world championship in the age-old sport of boxing. To be sure, the prize monies — more than $30 million dollars — did give me pause. Sports figures are considered nobodies unless they are paid in the million dollar range, but even so, for a single night (which might only last a few minutes), it was a bit more than the usual. No doubt the contestants thought they were worth it. I did not, and in fact I think that we ought to boycott the whole sport.

It is bad enough that two men get rewarded for trying to render the other one unconscious, if possible. In the process, they are legally entitled to inflict the kind of mayhem which would otherwise qualify as a criminal offence. Not here: the victor is considered a hero and the victim usually becomes a has-been in short order.

One of these has-beens, so I learned, was a former champion (excuse the expression) who has served time in jail for rape and is now back collecting big bucks. I understand it was a truly distinguished fight: heads butting against each other, faces smeared with blood and the "always-gentle" Mike Tyson biting a piece out of his opponent's ear and then trying for the other ear as well. He probably read about Vincent Van Gogh prior to the fight, or maybe he had seen a picture.

The first time, the referee ruled that biting a piece of one's opponent's ear was accidental, even though Tyson had already spit out his mouthpiece, thus making his attack possible. Had nothing else happened, fascinated watchers would doubtlessly have seen further biting incidents.

The second bite was apparently too much, even for the referee, and thus the tale came to an end and Tyson was disqualified, but not without calling "foul."

Those of you who did not follow this absorbing news — probably because your attention was riveted on Hong Kong and Canada Day — may wonder whether this tale was written by a modern-day Lewis Caroll. No, this was not Alice in Wonderland. It was a "must" for which worthies paid $5,000 to watch from close by, and no doubt they felt rewarded by seeing something that they had never seen before.

Many years ago, I advocated that boxing ought to be barred from television, as a prelude to getting rid of the sport as public entertainment. As with some of my other suggestions, I was spectacularly unsuccessful. Too bad, for it describes our kind of culture. A parent may not legally be permitted to discipline a child physically, but hitting somebody until he falls down senseless is called "the sport of boxing" and passes the scrutiny of the law.

I once paid attention to boxing when a Jewish boy from Omaha, Max Baer, knocked out the German hero Max Schmeling. That was at a time when I was still living in Germany and when Jews were depicted as physical weaklings, and there was Baer, who later became the heavyweight champion of the world. Since then I have preferred to look for champions in other fields.

Rabbinic Reflections

One small step...

By RABBI MOSHE SHULMAN

Thirty-seven verses in the Torah wasted! What a crime! Thirty-seven verses in the Torah are dedicated to where the Jews camped in the desert, where they rested, and how many times they changed venues! "These are the journeys of the children of Israel ... from Ra'amses to Sukkot ... from Chazterot to Ritma ... from Rissa to Keheleta..." (Num. 33)

The truth is, however, that behind this list of places there is a very profound message to the people. Moses was saying to Israel: look back and see how far you've come! After 40 years, it was time for national introspection. Who were we when we started, and who or what had we become? What had it taken to transform us from scared, weak, enslaved tribesmen into strong warring soldiers? What journey had to be travelled to change us from idol worshipers to the chosen people, committed to Torah and mitzvot?

It certainly didn't happen overnight. We didn't wake up one morning, see a vision, and cry out: "I believe!" Yes, Jews saw many miracles, including the greatest of them all, the Revelation of G-d at Mt. Sinai. But even that great miracle lasted only 40 days, after which we were back to our old tricks.

We learned the hard way that you can't take slaves and turn them into free people with Revelation. People don't change their entire lifestyles because of one inspirational speech, even if the speaker is the Almighty Himself!

In the desert it took 40 years of hard work, following G-d from place to place. Look back, said Moses, to where and what we were in Ra'amses, what types of things concerned us at Sukkot, and Eilim. Remember the stories of the golden calf, the complaints about water, the spies, the rebellion of Korach. Remember the 40 years. With each new place we encamped, with each new step, we came closer to achieving our goal.

Today, everyone is concerned with Jewish continuity and Jewish commitment. How do people develop commitment to Judaism? The answer lies in these 37 obscure verses. Commitment comes one step at a time.

Too many people misunderstand Judaism to be an "all or nothing package. They learn about 613 commandments, about Shabbat, kashrut, Torah study, or any other Jewish value — and say to themselves, "It's all too overwhelming." Nothing could be further from the truth. If G-d would have demanded from us "all or nothing," He would have left us at the foot of Mt. Sinai!

What the Torah demands is that we grow in Judaism, that tomorrow we are better Jews than we were yesterday, one mitzvah at a time, one Jewish value at a time! Shabbat begins with Shabbat candles, a Shabbat meal, perhaps Shabbat songs, and grows from there. One can grow in Yiddishkeit one day at a time, one mitzvah at a time, one step at a time.

That's the Torah's message. Look at what we have accomplished, where we have come from, how much we've achieved, and how we did it one step at a time. It didn't happen in one giant leap. It happened because we went from place to place. And in each new place we learned a new lesson, a new concept, a new mitzvah, and grew that much more.

Moses showed us the way. Each of us must continue to learn and grow. But we must not be frightened by what we see as the distance between where we are and where we are going. The distance is only the length between where we stand today and where we stand tomorrow! One small step at a time, slowly, we can journey great distances and conquer great horizons.

Shabbat Shalom.

Writer discusses bible's lurid episodes

The Harlot by the Side of the Road*, by Jonathan Kirsch (Random House, $37).

The themes of sex and violence, so prominent in the great classics of antiquity, are not alien to the Torah. This is to be expected, since they dominate human relationships and the Torah is replete with narratives concerning human development.

The Torah portrays human beings as they are, made of flesh and blood. And when they act immorally (as all human beings do at times — "for there is no man on earth who does only good and does not sin"), when they yield to the temptation to do evil, they are exposed. The Torah was meant for adults, not children, and God must not be identified with middle-class morality.

In The Harlot by the Side of the Road, Jonathan Kirsch, a book critic, novelist and lawyer, discusses some of the Torah's lurid and shocking episodes: the incest of Lot's daughters; the rape of Dinah; Tamar and Judah; Zipporah, Moses and the Bridegroom of Blood; Jephthah and his daughter; Tamar and Amnon; and David and Bathsheba.

The book's title refers to Genesis 38, where we are told of Jacob's son Judah, who breaks a promise and refuses to give his third son in marriage to Tamar after the others die. She then disguises herself as a prostitute, seduces her father-in-law and becomes pregnant. Instead of paying her, Judah leaves his staff and seal with her as pledges and Tamar subsequently uses them to prove his paternity.

The author places each episode within the social and political context of its time, indicates why, through the ages, some versions were censored or intentionally misinterpreted, and explains how these accounts have something vital to impart to contemporary readers.

Dinah, daughter of Jacob, was raped by Shechem, son of Hamor. Upon hearing of this brazen insult and of his desire to marry their sister, Jacob's sons acted: "They put Hamor and his son Shechem to the sword, took Dinah out of Shechem's house, and went away."

The Torah concludes the narrative with Jacob remonstrating against this violence, pointing out that one such deed leads to further actions of a similar nature: "You have brought trouble on me, making me odious among the inhabitants of the land...so that if they attack me, I and my family will be destroyed."

But his sons answered, "Should our sister be treated like a whore?" As in the modern crime passionnel, the sexual affront could not be overlooked and remain unanswered.

The grave sins of King David — arranging the murder of Uriah the Hittite and the taking of his wife Bathsheba — aroused the anger of Nathan the Prophet, who unsparingly describes the punishment that will befall David's family.

The words of Nathan's prophecy were soon fulfilled. Amnon, one of King David's sons, lusted after Tamar, David's daughter by another wife. Amnon feigned illness, prevailed upon the king to allow Tamar to nurse him and then raped her.

Moreover, this narrative of incest and cruelty ends in hatred between brother and sister and between brother and brother, for Absolom, Tamar's full-brother, harbored sentiments of vengeance against Amnon and, when an opportunity presented itself, had him murdered.

Absolom flees David's wrath and a full-fledged revolt breaks out. Absolom further fulfils Nathan's prophecy by sleeping with David's concubines, a deed that signifies political and familial usurpation. He performs this "ritual act" in public on the rooftop, "with the full knowledge of all Israel." This mirrors David's first view of Bathsheba bathing on her rooftop. Sexual betrayal thus comes full circle.

Missionaries describe 19th century Jews

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

In 1839, a group of Protestant missionaries from the Church of Scotland travelled through Europe to the Holy Land and back, surveying Jewish communities wherever they went. Their object was to assess how ripe the Jews were for conversion by observing Jewish sites, living conditions and attitudes.

Their fascinating account, Narrative of A Mission of Inquiry to The Jews, published in Philadelphia 158 years ago, contains many outstanding descriptions of Jewish communities in Central and Eastern Europe as well as in the Holy Land. The authors regarded the Jews highly and penned much that is now of special interest to Jewish genealogists.

Departing from London, the deputation moved through France, Italy, Malta and Greece, then sailed to Egypt. The elaborate descriptions of Jewish life in Palestine include this prescient account of the encampment of philanthropist Moses Montefiore on Jerusalem's Mount of Olives:

"He had fixed a cord round the tents at a little distance, that he might keep himself in quarantine. On the outside of this, a crowd of about 20 or 30 Jews were collected, spreading out their petitions before him. Some were getting money for themselves, some for their friends, some for the purposes of religion. It was an interesting scene, and called up to our minds the events of other days, when Israel were not strangers in their own land."

The travellers returned through Cyprus, Constantinople and present-day Romania, Ukraine, Austria, Poland, Slovakia and Germany, recording their impressions of many Jewish communities, synagogues, prayer services, marriages, funerals, schools, inns, customs and dress. The passage on Iasi, describing local Jews from Odessa, Vienna, Germany and Spain, suggest that the average Jewish community was anything but homogenous.

Further highlighting this diversity is the revelation that Iasi's roughly 25,000 Jews supported about 200 synagogues, most of them small, with several grouped together in small areas.

The authors provide good introductory sketches of many places. Czernowitz, for example, "is a pleasant town, with streets wide, well aired and clean. The houses are generally two or three stories high, and there are barracks and other public buildings...There are 3,000 Jews here, with eight synagogues, only three of which are large. These three we visited, being all under the roof of one large edifice. The congregation were engaged in worship when we entered [and]...a group soon gathered round each of us at different parts of the synagogue. On saying to those around, 'We have been at Jerusalem,' they were immediately interested, and asked, 'Are the Jews there like the Jews here?'"

Through such accounts a rich tapestry emerges. In Zalosc, pictures of a famous Rabbi Landau adorned most Jewish houses. In Potkamin, the "shamesh or beadle" knocked loudly on every Jewish door to summon synagogue congregants to prayer. Many Jewish cemeteries and even some headstones are elaborately described. The cemetery at Tarnapol, for example, "is covered with upright gravestones, some of them 200 years old, having inscriptions generally in good preservation, and some elegant monuments over the Rabbis."

Brody, with its 150 synagogues, "seemed wholly a Jewish city; and the few gentiles who appeared here and there were quite lost in the crowd of Jews." Here the travellers' sleep in a respectable Jewish inn was disrupted by a series of Jewish hawkers at an early hour.

"First of all the door was pushed open, then a fur-cap and long beard thrust in, while a voice demanded, in German, if we needed knives or combs. No sooner was this visitor gone, than another similar head was thrust in, and a voice asked if we wished to buy soap. This singular kind of annoyance was repeated by eight similar visitors before we were fully dressed, and we were obliged at last in self-defence to lock the chamber-door."

It's clear the authors could not help but see the Jews as a sorrowful anachronism of history. Still, their attitude is generally benign and they managed to capture quintessential elements of a diverse, complex, thriving culture. Genealogists seeking insights into specific localities may find them here. Narrative of A Mission of Inquiry to The Jews is available from many university libraries across North America.

Take a virtual trip to land of Israel

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Shalom! Today, we are continuing our virtual trip to Israel.

Are you a veteran tourist who's been there done that? Then take a look at the Jerusalem Post's large archive of tourism-related articles that should surprise even the most seasoned traveller [http://www.jpost.com/Tourism/]. For example, in Succah in the Desert [http://www.jpost.com/Tourism/Article-0.html], Haim Shapiro writes about his visit to a unique spot near the Mitzpe Ramon area of the Negev.

After being served a simple dinner, guests are shown to their own little sukkah made of "old telephone poles covered with layers of canvas, plastic and palm fronds." Shapiro loved the food but found the accommodations a bit wanting.

Looking for ritzier lodgings but tired of the same old hotels? Good Morning Jerusalem [http://www.yaronmor.co.il/gmj/] is a reservation service for bed and breakfast facilities across the country and holiday apartments in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

Here are a few sites that offer very practical information. Ever at a loss calculating how many shekalim to expect for the dollar? No problem if you use Travel-Finder's Currency Convertor [http://www.travel-finder.com/convert/convert.htm]. (Your browser must be able to handle Java to use this page.) And check out [http://www.inisrael.com./tour/main.html] and click on Prices in Israel to find out how far your shekel will go.

If you're looking for road maps of the country, try [http://www.geocities.com/~israeltouring/maps.html] and click on the area that interests you. There are even distance charts included. Also try [http://www.hotelstravel.com/israel.html#mp] and MapQuest [http://www.mapquest.com/]. None of these maps is perfect but they will do in a pinch.

And no, it's not a glamorous site but if you've forgotten what time it is in Israel, just type in [gopher://brachot.jct.ac.il:13/0/] and you'll get an instant, accurate answer.

Still looking for more information? Then try Israel Hotel Association [http://www.israelhotels.org.il/]; Hotels and Travel in Israel [http://www.hotelstravel.com/israel.html]; Hostels in Israel [http://www.hostels.com/il.html]; and The Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel [http://www.learningvacations.com/eco7.htm].

So, after all your travels, are you begining to feel that since Israel is such a nice place to visit, it must be an even nicer place to live?

In a future column, I'll look at Aliyah sites on the Jewish Highway.

Until then, Lehitraot!

Jewish authors

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Like a latter-day prophet of Israel, novelist A.B. Yehoshua utters a variety of lamentations — mostly of a political nature — and says that "it is the task of the intellectual to say what he thinks."

His biggest lament seems to be centered around Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, whom Yehoshua accuses of poisoning the atmosphere of peace that had been building in the region: "The feeling was that we were creating a new climate with the Palestinians. I don't think he can destroy the Oslo agreement, but he has contaminated it, just as he has contaminated the new relationship between Israel and the other Arab countries. I feel myself a total opponent to him. What can I say? I don't like him; it's that simple."

A fifth-generation Jerusalemite who now teaches literature at Haifa University, Yehoshua also laments the government's Har Choma housing project, seeing it as an unnecessary provocation.

Yehoshua says he is part of an old school of Israeli Hebrew writers who regard it as a moral imperative to speak their minds. "There's a tradition dating from the very beginning of Zionism that writers were involved in the political discussions of the country," the 61-year-old author of six novels and numerous short stories told The CJN during a recent visit to Toronto.

"My generation is the last one to speak up. The new writers are far more indifferent. They're tired of the politics and they want to remain in their little corners. This is not good because we still have many problems and when intellectuals choose not to get involved, we lose certain voices that were respected by Israelis, even when they didn't agree with what was being said."

Perhaps his most well-known and critically acclaimed novel is Mr. Mani, which became the basis for the popular Israeli TV serial that was screened at Toronto's Jewish film festival last spring. The book, which Yehoshua has called "intergenerational psychoanalysis," covers six generations of Jewish history from 1848 to 1982, through the medium of five separate conversations that go backward chronologically.

Like much of Yehoshua's fiction, Mr. Mani uses a multiplicity of voices as it grapples with central issues of the Jewish nation: he tends to project the problems of the nation into the lives of his characters. Critics have dubbed him "Israel's Faulkner," in part because of his use of multiple voices, his treatment of history and myth, his gloom and his recognition that the roots of the past are so thoroughly entwined around the present.

A theme that often emerges in his novels involves the splintering of an ideal: the fragmentation and disintegration of Israeli society and the elusive unity of the Jewish people.

His first novel, The Lover, reflects a deep disappointment with the implementation of the Zionist dream, while his second, A Late Divorce, examines questions about the Diaspora and presents an acutely observed reflection of current social realities in Israel. His stories often highlight the tension between the native-born Israelis — sabras, like Yehoshua — and the generation of Israelis who were born in Europe and fled Nazism.

Yehoshua's latest book in English is Open Heart, a story of adulterous love that stretches between Israel and India; it has received mixed reviews. In Israel, his most recent Hebrew title, Voyage To The End of The Millennium, appeared earlier this year. (It has not yet been translated into English.) A historical novel set in the 10th century, it it represents something of a departure for Yehoshua, it is still very much in keeping with his habit of exploring schisms within the Jewish world.

"This is a fascinating and obscure period that we don't know much about. The book describes encounters with Oriental Jews, Islamic Jews and Western Jews. Most Jews at the time were Islamic Jews. This was the time of the first split between the Ashkenazim and the Sephardim; I wanted to examine this split."

In particular, the book examines attitudes around the practice of polygamy, of which the Sephardi world supposedly approved but the Ashkenazi world did not.

Writing in the language of the Bible — "a language that was dying at the beginning of the 19th century" — Yehoshua says he is proud to participate in Hebrew's historic renaissance.

"I can say that Hebrew is a flexible, modern language, a rare example of a language that has been revived. It's a very antique language and this is its special charm. I would say that if the prophet Ezekiel came here and heard me speak Hebrew, he would understand me. English is only 900 years old, but I doubt you would be able to understand the language of William the Conqueror."

As he orchestrates a multiplicity of voices in his fiction, Yehoshua contends that Israel's social diversity "must be caught and understood by different voices, because Israeli reality has become a multi-voiced reality."

Speaking of the group of senior Israeli writers who inject their voices into the national cacophony, he declares: "My colleagues and I have been very much respected as a group. Not always do people agree with us, but they listen.

"There's a tradition in Israel of listening to the prophets, even if they are anti-government. I'm not saying we're prophets, but if you look at the prophets in the Bible, they were a kind of social critic. They were not speaking about theology, they were speaking about the state of the nation, about politics, about social justice, about foreign relationships. And they didn't hesitate to criticize the king."

Filmmaker employs digital technology

By PAMELA SWEDKO
Special to The CJN

Aaron Weintraub

TORONTO — Without any formal training or hi-tech equipment, Aaron Weintraub, then only 14, created his own brand of animation using basic software and a PC from school.

When Weintraub was 17, he went on a high school field trip that led him to Topix computer graphics and animation house, where he impressed the artists with a demonstration of his low-tech, amateur work.

Weintraub, now 21, recently completed his third year of film studies at York University and has worked part time at Mad Dog, a division of Topix that handles high-end digital post production and design.

He is becoming one of a new wave of filmmakers who are digitally literate and knowledgeable about the newest technologies, while also knowing about the art of filmmaking.

Working on the industry's most advanced equipment, Weintraub has been involved in almost everything produced at Mad Dog, including spots they did for Panasonic, which are receiving award-winning recognition worldwide, and he was one of the artists on a recent David Bowie video.

He had his first opportunity at Mad Dog when the creative director from Much Music called looking for someone to prepare an introduction with graphics and other technical elements.

Everyone else was busy with other projects and Mad Dog president Sylvain Taillon offered the services of his student employee. The creative directors decided to give Weintraub a chance.

Weintraub was given a few days to experiment with some ideas before they discussed the project further, but only three days later he had finished a piece of animation that surprised everyone, including the creative director at Much Music who put it on air just as Weintraub had created it.

"I realize that doing animation requires a lot of the same skills as classical film, like storytelling, composition, the art of motion and how things move in the frame. So, I figure that film school is the best place for me, because with that sort of stuff, things haven't really changed. It's the technology used to make that happen that's changed. Its a different set of tools, but the basics are still there."

Weintraub says he hasn't put much thought into what the future will bring.

"I would like to make films," he says, "but I want it to be combination of all this stuff — traditional and digital. I would like to have my hands in every aspect of creating a project."

Women to study Torah

TORONTO — A yarchei kallah for women, a program of intensive Torah study, will be held at Or Chaim Yeshiva, 159 Almore Dr., Aug. 5 to 7.

The three-day program, sponsored by Canadian Friends of Nishmat, is designed for women of all educational backgrounds, levels and ages.

Each day's study consists of two sessions during which participants prepare English or Hebrew source material in partnered (chavrutah) study. This is followed by a seminar led by Rabbanit Chana Henkin, founder and director of Nishmat, the Jerusalem Centre for Advanced Jewish Study for Women.

The program's topic is the Song of Songs, and themes studied will include the song of the lover and the beloved; the literary changes in the role of women from a passive to active role and the thoughts of modern Jewish thinkers on the Song of Songs.

Rabbanit Henkin founded Nishmat seven years ago as a centre for Jewish learning that placed no limits on a woman's study of Jewish texts. In an age when Jewish women are pursuing all areas of secular study, she said, it is imperative that their Jewish knowledge reach the same intellectual heights.

Nishmat has over 400 students, including Russians and Ethiopians, studying from beginners to advanced levels.

In conjunction with the ads, which appeared in 19 languages, including Yiddish, the SBA launched a new claims process. It will be supervised by the Swiss Federal Banking Commission and an independent commission headed by Paul Volcker, former chair of the U.S. Federal Reserve.

Ernst & Young, the international accounting firm, has been designated to sift through claims, which will be resolved within one year. Contact offices have been set up in New York, Tel Aviv, Budapest, Sydney and Basel.

As a result of the new procedures, Hanspeter Hani, the ombudsman appointed by the SBA to handle claims against dormant accounts, has been replaced by the Ernst & Young office in Basel.

"After the passage of so many years, we are pleased that the (SBA) has taken this initiative," she said in a communique issued in Montreal. "Congress sincerely hopes that Switzerland's efforts to make restitution to Holocaust survivors will result in the return of the assets of Swiss bank accounts to their rightful owners."

In a statement, they declared: "This is an important step in the Swiss people's accounting of their country's wartime dealings with the Nazis and the assets stolen from Jews during the Holocaust, and their acceptance of responsibility for these acts."

In an interview, Moshe Ronen, chair of Congress' Ontario Region, expressed irritation that only "a fraction" of the names were in fact released.

He said this data should have been made public after the war. "There is a certain degree of anger that it has taken 50 years for the Swiss to release this information."

Nathan Leipciger, co-chair of Congress' Holocaust Remembrance Committee, described the list as drastically incomplete. But he said he was heartened by the SBA's plan to publish another list later this year.

Leipciger, an Auschwitz survivor, noted that dormant accounts are only one aspect of the problem. "They're sitting on thousands of kilograms of (Nazi) confiscated gold, worth between $6 to $7 billion," he said, referring to Swiss banks.

Ron Singer, a Toronto claimant who believes that his Polish uncle opened a Swiss bank account before he perished in the Holocaust, voiced mixed feelings about the list.

"As a beginning, it's fine. But it's hardly definitive."

Responding to news that the Bank of Canada had begun a review of its records to verify a 1944 U.S. intelligence report about its involvement in a Nazi money laundering scheme, Abella called for a full accounting of the reported transaction.

The Bank of Canada should appoint an impartial historian and establish a neutral advisory board to look into the matter, said Abella, a York University historian and co-author of the 1982 classic, None is Too Many: Canada & the Jews of Europe, 1933-1948.

Nazi gold scandal hits home

OTTAWA — Hardly a day goes by, it seems, without a shocking new revelation in the Swiss-Nazi gold scandal. To wit: "Vatican held plundered Swiss gold;" followed, of course, by the obligatory "Vatican denies receiving pounds of Nazi loot;" or, "Swiss list victims of Nazi looting."

But for the most part, Canada and the federal government have stood largely on the sidelines throughout the dizzying events of the past few years. (The government has had enough trouble defending its pitiful record on Nazi war criminals, especially with the onslaught of international attention brought about as a result of the Rambo-like tactics of American private investigator Steve Rambam).

Until now.

The World Jewish Congress (WJC) has unearthed documents which suggest the Bank of Canada may have been used during World War II to launder thousands of kilograms of the gold plundered by the Nazis from banks and Holocaust victims.

The declassified U.S. intelligence documents revealed the Bank of Portugal and Swiss National Bank swapped tonnes of gold looted by the Nazis for clean gold held in the Bank of Canada and the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

Here's how the complex paper trail — where no gold actually physically moved and no Nazi gold actually landed in Canada — appears to have worked:

The Bank of Canada was holding gold for the Swiss that was deposited in its vaults for safekeeping before the war, sometime between 1935 and 1939. A number of European countries had shipped gold to Canada and the United States for safekeeping, should they be invaded.

The contentious swap occured when the Bank of Portugal, which had been buying looted gold from Nazi Germany, physically deposited four tonnes of "dirty" gold in its account in the Swiss National Bank. The Swiss then asked Canada's central bank to transfer ownership of an equal amount of Swiss gold stored in Ottawa to Portugal. Meanwhile, in Switzerland, the four tonnes that were held in the name of Portugal's bank were then transferred back to the Swiss.

A Sept. 10, 1944, document uncovered by the WJC in the archives in Washington from the Overseas Special Services (the predecessor of the Central Intelligence Agency) quotes a "very confidential source" describing the 1942 paper transaction as "measures taken to eliminate evidence of origin of gold bars…the amount thus exchanged being 4,020 kilos. The gold in Canada was prewar but the gold in Switzerland was probably tainted."

"You have the simple swap in which no gold physically moves, but with a few strokes of a pen, all the bad guys win," said Elan Steinberg, executive director of WJC.

"Nazi Germany has sold their looted gold to Portugal. Portugal has exchanged its tainted gold holdings for clean gold in Canada and the Swiss National Bank has earned big fat commissions on each of these transactions."

So what of the Bank of Canada's involvement — willing launderer or blind dupe?

As is their wont, the always duelling Jewish organizations, Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, called for urgent investigations.

"Several countries have begun to establish independent commissions to examine their roles in this matter, and we call upon Prime Minister Jean Chretien to likewise launch an investigation into the very serious allegations of Canadian involvement," said B'nai Brith president Lyle Smordin.

"Only through an honest examination of the past can we learn from history and create a better future."

On paper, the Bank of Canada does not appear to have done anything illegal. But Bernie Farber of CJC says the Jewish community must know whether the bank simply "closed its eyes to the transaction" and followed routine banking regulations without questioning the motives behind the transfer.

"This was a significant transaction worth millions of dollars at that time.The biggest question is how knowing was Canada about the origin of this gold and what were its moral obligations to find out? Did they suspect where it came from?

"We're not pointing fingers, but this is a serious historical issue and we want to clear the records and see what Canada's role was: minor or otherwise."

So far, at least, the Bank of Canada has been mouthing all the right words.The bank, which apparently has a thing or two to teach other federal institutions about openness, obliged with the promise of a "quick and thorough" investigation.

"We share your concern that the gold of other central banks held for safekeeping in Canada could have been associated in any way, however indirect, with Nazi Germany gold transactions," bank governor Gordon Thiessen said in a letter to Congress.

The bank investigation will include an examination of its archival records, as well as normal banking practices of the time and the historical context surrounding the gold transaction.

The results, though, are not yet in.

15th Maccabiah Games

Tragedy mars opening ceremonies as two killed

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel Correspondent

RAMAT GAN — The opening ceremony of the Maccabiah games began in tragedy when a temporary pedestrian bridge carrying Australian athletes collapsed into the Yarkon River, killing two team members and injuring over 60 other Australians and several Austrian athletes. Seven Australians remain in hospital in serious condition.

The accident occurred when over 5,000 athletes from 57 countries were being marshalled together about 100 metres from the stadium. The assembly point was separated from the stadium by the narrow Yarkon River and the athletes had to cross the bridge to march into the stadium Olympic-style and alphabetically by country.

Late last week, a third Australian athlete died from injuries she sustained when the bridge collapsed.

The Austrian contingent had almost cleared the bridge to prepare for a triumphant entry into the packed stadium when the first third of the 373-member Australian team started to cross. Suddenly, the bridge collapsed in the centre, throwing most of those on it into the water. Others piled on top of each other in the bottom of the V-shaped tangle of metal, wood and aluminum sheeting that had formed the walkway.

Many of those who were pushed into the river ingested water that was heavily treated with chemicals against mosquitoes and contained partly treated sewage.

Inside the arena, a capacity crowd of 50,000 spectators filled every corner of the stadium, anticipating the start of the opening ceremony. Hundreds of Canadian supporters were in the stadium, ready to welcome Canada's biggest-ever delegation to a Maccabiah — a total of 400 people, of which 290 were athletes. Maple leaf flags together with Maccabiah emblems were very much in evidence.

The ceremony was due to start at 8 p.m. with the entry of each team into the stadium. Some motor vehicles and motorcycles from the early years of the state were driven in display around the same perimeter track that was to be used by the athletes.

Moments later, there was an announcement of a delay in the opening ceremony, but no explanation was given. The announcement was repeated several times until President and Mrs. Weizman came into the stadium to meet the heads of the Maccabiah movement and shortly afterwards, to declare the games open.

Meanwhile, urgent behind-the-scenes discussions ensued as to whether to cancel the opening ceremony, as it was known that at least one person had died in the accident. In the end, it was decided to go ahead with a very much shortened version, consisting mainly of dance routines with many hundreds of participants in the central arena. The waiting teams were unable to enter the stadium, due to the collapse of the bridge.

Following the lighting of the Maccabiah flame by Israeli basketball champion Mickey Berkovitch, the opening ceremony was brought to a close. At this time, an explanation was given to the crowd, which was largely unaware of the drama being played outside the stadium. The waiting athletes were also not told why they were kept for more than two hours before being taken by buses back to their hotels.

There was much controversy as to why the opening ceremony was allowed to continue, even in a shortened version.

An inquiry was launched by the police and Ministry of Education to find out as quickly as possible if the design of the bridge was inadequate, the materials used in its construction were substandard, or the engineering specifications were inadequate for the number of people due to use the bridge.

There is one thing with which everybody is in agreement. The ambulance, police and soldiers on the scene risked their own lives to help the stranded athletes. Within 20 minutes of the collapse, every injured person had been moved to hospital.

Many blamed in bridge collapse

By RAINE MARCUS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A chain of negligence was blamed on all parties involved in the collapse of the Maccabiah footbridge on July 14, in which two members of the Australian contingent were killed and 66 injured.

According to the findings presented by the Education Ministry's Dotan committee, the sequence of foul-ups began with engineer Micha Bar-Ilan, who designed the bridge, and continued with the Irgunit construction firm and its subcontractor, Ben-Ezra Construction, and the Maccabiah organizing committee. The Dotan committee passed its findings on to the Dan sub-district police, whose investigation continues.

Faulty planning, negligence, incompetence, inferior materials, lack of coordination between construction companies and organizing bodies, and lack of technical experience are just some of the factors mentioned in the report. It was completed in just eight days, so that results could be presented before the end of the Maccabiah.

In a packed press conference at Tel Aviv's Beit Sokolov, Deputy Education Minister Moshe Peled expressed his condolences to the families of the two victims and praised the speedy work of rescuers.

Peled then proceeded to explain the bridge collapse as symbolizing a deteriorating Israeli society, in which "amateurism and the notions of 'it'll be okay, don't worry' are contributing to unnecessary deaths; [this attitude] is also expressed in traffic accidents.

"Lives are lost because of total lack of respect, disdain and indifference," said Peled. "Our society must be changed by education. We tend to say, 'We'll cross that bridge when we come to it.' This time we failed, and didn't even reach the bridge."

The commission's experts — professors at the Technion and members of the Engineering and Architecture Associations — summarized the technical findings:

- Faulty planning and failure to comply with Standards Institution criteria.
- Inexperienced builders, who had no authorization to build bridges.
- Substandard materials.
- Faulty coordination between builders and planners.
- Total lack of supervision and control.
- Implementation of the work without essential plans and instructions.
- The use of ready-made materials which were in need of maintenance and were inappropriate for the bridge.

None of the parties involved in the bridge's construction took responsibility, and each passed the buck to the other, the committee emphasized.

Peled and Dotan also said that the company commissioning the bridge should have had a supervision and control system to ensure it was fit for use. At present, there is no law specifying safety regulations for such temporary constructions at events, said Peled.

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel Correspondent

METULLA — Canada's decisively beat the United States 6-1 to take the gold medal in the final of the Maccabiah ice hockey competition before a capacity crowd at the Canada Centre.

The Canadians dominated the match from the beginning, as time and time again they broke through the U.S. defence in a fine display of teamwork, and in the case of David Nemirovsky, a virtuoso solo performance. No less than three times, in the first, fifth and sixth goals, Nemirovsky seemed to come from nowhere to crack the puck into the U.S. goal, to the delight of the Canadian fans.

The remaining goals were scored by Jamie Sokolsky (second goal, assisted by Nemirovsky), Cory Pecker (third goal), and Aaron Brand (fourth goal, again assisted by Nemirovsky).

The first period saw Canada quickly establish a commanding lead of 2-0. In the second period the Americans began to get their act together and for the only time in the game seemed to challenge Canada. It was in the second period that Brett Chodorow scored the Americans' only goal in the game. The period also produced Canada's third and fourth goals.

In the final period all eyes were on Nemirovsky. When he scored his hat-trick the crowd went wild. The goal was set up by Sokolsky. Nemirovsky seemed to pick up a loose puck about a metre from the U.S. defence line and slammed it into the goal before the Americans could set themselves up.

The hockey competition was a Maccabiah first, with Canada the United States, Ukraine and Israel taking part.

In the previous day's semi-finals the United States beat Israel 10-2. Even though the win was decisive, the Israelis were unrelenting in their effort to stay in the game, but in the end experience showed through.

The other semi-final between Canada and the Ukraine was a game that should not have been played, as the Canadian team had been given a technical win as a result of Ukrainian injuries. Nevertheless the "game" was allowed to proceed, with most of the spectators unaware that for most of the time the "Ukrainian" goalie was either an Israeli or a goalie from the U.S. team. At the final whistle, the score was 14-3 with Nemirovsky, who plays for the NHL's Florida Panthers, scoring four of Canada's goals in what was no more than a practice match.

Ukraine met Israel for the third place bronze medal competition. Israel started playing aggressively and soon had a lead of 5-1 over the Ukrainians. However, the Israeli team seemed to fall apart and lose direction and the Ukrainians, who never seemed to lose their concentration, began to make up for lost time. At the final whistle, the score was eight goals each. In a sudden death period, Anatoly Nayda scored the winning goal and Ukraine took the bronze medal.

Women hoopsters fall short of medal goal

By VIVA PRESS
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — When Montrealer Dalya Greenberg scored the first basket in Canada's game against Hungary on July 18, it looked as though Canada was headed for a win.

The Canadian women's basketball team came out playing aggressive ball and initially took the lead. But eight minutes into the game, the Canadian team began to fall apart. First there was a travelling call against Canada, then a handover and then fouls. With 12:00 left on the clock in the first half, Hungary took a one-point lead and the Canadian team was forced to play catch-up ball for the remainder of the game. Hungary ended up beating Canada by a score of 66-42.

The game was entertaining despite the loss. Canada's top scorers were Greenberg with seven points, and Eva Ain and Netta Krumer with six points each.

The teams were fairly evenly matched, said Sy Herling the coach of the Canadian team. And the results showed that he was right. Canada ended with 21 fouls compared to Hungary's 20.

"We didn't play very well," said Greenberg, 20. "They out-hustled us and outplayed us."

At the end of the first half, the score was 30-24 for Hungary. In the second half, the Canadian team had a hard time focusing on their game. Five minutes into the second half, Canada was running the ball well, scored two in a row and looked as if they were poised for a comeback. However, Canada drew more fouls, committed a handover and never recovered.

The Hungarian fans roared with encouragement as the Canadian fans, who had been very enthusiastic at the beginning, drew back into their seats.

It was evident that Canada was going to be 0-2, after their first two games.

In the round robin format of the tournament, each of the three teams, Israel, Hungary and Canada, played four games.

Canada won its third game against Hungary with a score of 61-59; however, the team fell to Israel in its fourth game 64-29.

Canada's losses could be attributed, at least in part, to the fact that the team had been formed late and has not played together long enough.

"Four months ago, we weren't planning on being here," said Herling, who has coached basketball for the past 15 years. "Hungary faxed us and begged us to come to the games. We weren't sure if we could commit to raise the money."

To get here, each player had to come up with about $5,000.

"These girls are from Montreal and Toronto," said Herling. There was only one tryout for the team held in May. "We had to notify the players we knew about to come to the tryout."

If players had come from further away than Montreal, they would have been taking a risk on their transportation costs if they didn't make the team, Herling said. And while there may well be players in other parts of Canada who could have qualified for the team, he added, "All of these girls deserve to be here."

The challenge to play international ball was one that drew Greenberg to the tryouts.

"It's different," she said. "I'm not used to the refs calling it so tight, but it's neat."

Torontonian Robyn Lerer, 28, joined the team for another reason. "Playing for the Jewish Olympics is a dream come true," she said.

If the Canadian team hadn't become committed to participating, the women's basketball competition would have been shelved for another four years, said Herling. But since the women's basketball competition was inaugurated, there are already six other teams interested in playing in the women's division at the next Maccabi Games.

Judging mars tae kwon do matches

JERUSALEM — The Canadian tae kwon do team did not fare as well as it had hoped in the first-ever Maccabiah tae kwon do competition in Jerusalem. Then again, neither did any of the other teams. Most participants felt the judging was to blame.

Because all the judges and referees were Israeli, players, officials and coaches from the other teams said there was no way the competition could be ruled fair.

Canadian Corey Mincovitch, who has been doing tae kwon do for 25 years, has a fifth degree blackbelt, and ranks second overall among Jewish fighters in North America, says he is disappointed.

"Nowhere in World Tae Kwon Do Federation history do they allow all the judges to be of one nationality," he said.

Judging wasn't the only problem at the competition, said Oury Stantman, one of the French coaches. "In most international competitions, the scoring is done with an electronic board," Stantman explained. "Here, however, the referee keeps the score in his head so no one knows the score until the match has ended."

"I don't know how you can have fairness when they [judges, refs] are all Israelis," said Mandy Schuner manager of the Australian delegation.

Despite its dissatisfaction with the judging, Canada won five medals. Canadian coach Adam Koffler was very happy with his team. "I think we did well, it was tough competition", said Koffler, who has a fourth degree black belt. I'm really proud of our fighters, they put their hearts in it."

Everyone on the Canadian team was a winner: Michal Meroz (light welterweight, silver); Raz Keshles (bantam feather, bronze); Corey Mincovitch (over 80kg, bronze); Robert Kurlender (up to 57kg, bronze); Robert Bradley (68-79kg, bronze).

The teams that participated in the women's fighting were Canada, Israel and Australia. In the mens' fighting, the delegations were Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, France, Israel, Mexico and the United States.

Opening day golden for Canuck swimmers

TEL AVIV — The Canadian swim team grabbed four medals in the first day of competition on July 20 at Tel Aviv University's pool.

Sharon Werner put Canada on the scoreboard in the first race of the night when she won bronze in the women's 100-metre freestyle with a time of 100:15. Chantal Harrison followed with a gold in the women's 200m butterfly, clocking a time of 2:20:55, a full second ahead of her nearest opponent.

Danny Heuman won a bronze medal in the 100m disabled race, and Jason Singer gave Canada its fourth medal of the night with a bronze finish in the 800m freestyle.

The swimming events had the crowd on its feet and by the end of the night, five records were broken, four of them by Israelis.

Montrealer Chantal Harrison, 22, who clinched the gold for Canada, is swimming at the Games for her third time. She has won gold in the 200m butterfly race twice before.

"I feel ecstatic," she said after the race, while still trying to catch her breath. "I can't believe it."

Jason Singer, 20, who also swam at the Games four years ago, shares her excitement. "I'm honored to represent Canada."

Singer's race was the most exciting of the night. With the theme-song to Superman playing in the background, the crowd cheered the eight athletes swimming in the first-ever 800m freestyle race. When the three medalists — Israel's Miki Halika (8:15:71), Venezuela's Daniel Venez (8:24:39), and Singer (8:33:14) — stood on the podium to get their medals, the crowd erupted with delight.

Those who did not place in the medals but made it in the top eight were: Kevin Gordon, 200m breaststroke, eighth place (2:27:51); Kevin Gordon, 200m butterfly, fifth place (2:13:76); Avi Mednick, 200m backstroke, fourth place (2:12:70); Joshua Kimmer, 200m backstroke, sixth place (2:17:89).

The swimming events continued on July 22 and 23.

Netanyahu opposes east Jerusalem project

By JAY BUSHINSKY and BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — In a tactical retreat from his usual advocacy of an expanded Jewish presence in eastern Jerusalem, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told his deeply divided cabinet last week the time is not ripe for the controversial Ras al-Amud housing project.

"The decision to erect a new neighborhood in Jerusalem must be in keeping with government policy," Netanyahu said. "This was not done and right now there is no sense in building at Ras al-Amud."

Meanwhile it was reported that an appeal was filed against the construction, blocking any building until a decision is handed down. The local appeals committee heard a petition by two city councillors Monday and must render a decision within 30 days.

The tract's owner, Miami-based investor Irving Moskowitz, said there should be no delay in construction and that governmental interference in the project would violate his right to buy and develop property in Israel.

Moskowitz contended that to prevent him from building in eastern Jerusalem merely because he is Jewish would be an act of discrimination. "People should be able to live wherever they choose," he said.

Ministers were of two minds, some supporting Netanyahu's pragmatic approach and others contending the Ras al-Amud housing is needed to strengthen Israel's grip on sectors of Jerusalem claimed by the Palestinian Authority as its future capital.

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert dismissed suggestions that the prime minister could intervene to get him to stop the building at Ras al-Amud.

"He can't approach me on this subject. I'm not the one who is building," Olmert said. "It's a private individual who owns the land. I am in favor of him [Moskowitz] doing whatever he wants with his property. Those are the basic rules of a free democratic regime — that the owner of private property can do with it what he wants."

As for his dispute with Netanyahu on the matter, he said: "It is permissible for the prime minister and the mayor to differ. We do not have a contract that requires that we always agree with one another."

Science Minister Michael Eitan not only supported Netanyahu, but also accused Olmert of "concealing the proceedings relative to this affair from the prime minister."

Assessing the issue from a strategic standpoint, Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky said it is important "to uphold Israel's right to build in Jerusalem and to prove that we have the strength to withstand pressure."

However, he differentiated between the Har Choma project, where there is no direct clash with a resident Arab population, and Ras al-Amud, where the potential for such conflict exists.

Ras al-Amud corridor to Mount of Olives

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Earlier in the year, when the debate raged over construction at Har Choma, that disputed hill was variously described — depending on whether one was speaking to Jews or Palestinians — as situated between Gilo and Ramat Rahel, or between Beit Sahur and Umm-Tuba.

Background to the news

This was no geographical dispute. It was an attempt to place it either in the Jewish or Arab part of the city.

No such debate exists regarding Ras al-Amud. With Silwan directly to the west, and the Mount of Olives to the north, Ras al-Amud is in the middle of eastern Jerusalem. Which is one reason it was likely so attractive to Irving Moskowitz.

Since the late 1970s, Moskowitz — the Miami philanthropist — has written a number of checks for Ateret Cohanim, the group that purchases properties for Jews in east Jerusalem. Beyond the religious and historic significance the group sees in having Jews live in areas like the Mount of Olives and Silwan (the "City of David"), it also has a political and strategic logic as well. Moving Jews into heavily populated Arab areas in the city may well forestall any attempt to give Arabs any form of control over those sections.

The best-known municipal proposal to confer a measure of such control was former mayor Teddy Kollek's idea for dividing the city into boroughs, with the Arabs to receive some type of administrative responsibility over the Arab sections.

Ateret Cohanim's purchase of property, and the movement of Jews into places like the Moslem Quarter of the Old City and Silwan, are in no small part meant to render such plans unworkable.

The 14-dunam plot at Ras al-Amud, with its view of the Old City, was first purchased over 100 years ago by Nissan Bak and Moshe Wittenberg, who represented two local kollels. The land, close to the Jewish cemetery on the Mount of Olives, was to be used as a cemetery for the people in the kollels.

After the War of Independence, when that part of the city fell under Jordanian control, an Arab man tried to register the land under his name, and began to sell parts of the plot. But in 1963, the Jordanian authority for absentee property filed suit, saying the land was improperly registered, and that it actually belonged to Jews. The Six Day War intervened before this case was worked out in the Jordanian courts.

After the war, the matter was taken up by the Israeli courts, and in 1984 the plot officially reverted back to the kollels, who in 1990 sold it to Moskowitz.

The plan for Ras al-Amud approved by the Jerusalem municipality, calls for the construction of some 70 apartments on the plot. This plan is different from the one approved last December, which called for the construction of 130 units for Jews, and a number of units for Arabs as well. That plan has not yet received the final nod. But Moskowitz need not wait for that plan, and hopes to begin building according to the approved plan.

When plans for the neighborhood were making their way through the various planning channels in the early 1990s, it was backed by the heads of the burial societies in Jerusalem, who saw it as a way to secure the Jewish cemetery at the Mount of Olives, which was constantly being vandalized.

Labor blasts PM's tactics

By MICHAL YUDELMAN and LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Labor leader Ehud Barak said that while everyone agrees on our right to build in Jerusalem, the decision to build on Ras al-Amud "at this time" is a severe mistake, similar to the disastrous Western Wall Tunnel affair.

Members of Barak's Party accused Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of pretending he did not know the Jerusalem Municipality had approved Irving Moskowitz's plans to build in Ras al-Amud, so that he could come out against the move.

MK Dalia Itzik said Labor has solid information from sources in Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert's office that Netanyahu knew about and approved of the building permits to Moskowitz.

"Netanyahu is playing a double game. He knew about the building permits and is denying it. He preferred to let the report be published so that he could pretend to be against it," Itzik said.

She charged the prime minister with "once again raising the Jerusalem issue to the top of the international agenda, causing the Palestinians to react sharply against us, and again making the Palestinians look much better than we do — not to mention that this move endangers the unity of Jerusalem. And all this for tactical, political considerations."

Itzik said Olmert's reactions indicate that the prime minister's bureau knew of the whole affair. "Besides, if the prime minister is really against [building in Ras al-Amud], why doesn't he call Olmert and ask him to raise the topic again in City Council, after guiding its members — among whom Olmert has a majority — to revoke its decision?"

She noted that the council is standing by its decision because its members know Netanyahu's objection is not serious.

U.S. peace envoy expected within two weeks

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — U.S. special envoy Dennis Ross is expected to return to the region within the next two weeks to attempt to bring Palestinians and Israelis back to the negotiating table.

Sources have given a number of reasons for the delay in Ross' arrival: the U.S. plan is still unfinished, and the American diplomats may be awaiting the outcome of European Union (EU) peace envoy Miguel Moratinos' efforts to keep the Syrians in the peace process.

The Spanish diplomat had been expected to confer with Foreign Minister David Levy last week, but the two did not meet. This cast doubt on Moratinos' original plan to fly to Damascus after consulting with Israeli leaders on the Knesset's preliminary vote requiring an 80-member majority for a prospective Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

Government officials discounted published reports claiming that the United States is threatening to back away from the Israeli-Palestinian dispute because of the impasse over Har Choma and the alleged expansion of settlements in the West Bank.

"In theory," one official said, "the United States could threaten to withhold political support in crucial UN debates on Middle Eastern issues, or reduce the quantity or quality of military assistance." But this was deemed "unrealistic" and "impractical" from the standpoint of American interests, such as the security and accessibility of the region's oil reserves.

The notion that the United States might suspend its role as the region's principal peacemaker is ludicrous, sources said, adding that this would enable the EU to achieve its undeclared, but apparent goal of overtaking the United States as the dominant diplomatic force in the Middle East.

One of the principal arguments expected to be raised by Ross is the existence of "dangers on the region's periphery," a euphemism for Iran's ongoing arms buildup and the prospect of the Teheran regime being equipped with long-range missiles capable of hitting targets in Israel or Saudi Arabia.

To cope with this scenario, the United States favors an early resolution of the various disputes that are preventing Israel and the Palestinian Authority from entering and completing final-status talks. The strategic value of such an outcome would be to assure the support of the neighboring Arab states — Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the Gulf emirates — in an American-led coalition similar to the one that confronted Iraq in the 1991 Gulf war.

Settlers more defiant about leaving homes: poll

By ARYEH DEAN COHEN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Almost half of the Israeli residents of Judea and Samaria will not accept a government decision to dismantle settlements there "under any circumstances," and 67 percent would refuse compensation in exchange for leaving, according to a poll published Sunday by the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University.

"In contrast to the pessimism expressed by settlers 18 months ago, the Israeli population over the Green Line today believes that it has friends in government," explained Prof. Efraim Inbar, director of the center.

"The settler public believes that [Prime Minister Binyamin] Netanyahu will protect their interests in peace talks. Settlers feel less threatened, and therefore are more defiant in relating to eventualities in the peace process."

The poll also found that 32 percent believe the peace process will crumble and the IDF will retake Palestinian population centers.

The poll on "political views of Israeli residents of Judea and Samaria," published in conjunction with the Nablus-based Center for Palestine Research and Studies, was conducted in June and based on phone interviews with 511 Jewish residents of 79 settlements in the West Bank. It has a margin of error of four percent.

A similar poll was conducted in December 1995, when Labor was in power. That poll found 22 percent of the settlers feared that "most" of their settlements would be dismantled over the next five to 10 years. Today, 62 percent believe that most of the settlements will be annexed to Israel or remain as they are.

Twenty percent of those polled in 1995 said they would abide by a Knesset decision to withdraw from the settlements or have them dismantled; the latest poll showed that figure had dropped to 14 percent.

The poll also showed that about half the settlers oppose or strongly oppose the "Allon-Plus" plan, with just over 30 percent supporting it. More than three-quarters rejected the "Yossi Beilin-Mahmoud Abbas [Abu Mazen]" plan.

Results of some of the questions in the poll follow (figures in parentheses are percentages from 1995):

"What will be the status of the settlements in Judea and Samaria in five to 10 years?"

• Most will be annexed to Israel: 31.2 percent (20.5);
• The status quo will remain: 31.3 percent (18);
• Most will stay within Palestinian territory with extra-territorial status: 16.3 percent (16);
• Most will be under Palestinian sovereignty and the settlers will be allowed to stay as permanent residents: four percent (4.7);
• Most settlements will be dismantled: 6.7 percent (22.3);
• Don't know: 10.5 percent (18.4).

"Given the current status of the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians, where do you think things will be five to 10 years from now?"

• Self-rule will be contained and not develop to become a Palestinian state: 20.4 percent (18.4);
• A Palestinian state will be established in Judea and Samaria: 30.1 percent (38.7);
• The peace process will fail and the IDF will return to control Judea and Samaria: 32.1 percent (26);
• Don't know: 17.4 percent (16.8).

Fascists rise in Russia

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — They wear black shirts and berets and greet each other with the stiff-armed salute and a battle cry "Slava Rossii," or Glory to Russia.

They are the members of Russian National Unity, or RNE, the country's most prominent ultra-nationalist group.And their claim that they have penetrated high echelons of power has generated front-page news.

The Stavropol branch of RNE claims about 2,000 followers. "We have a huge number of supporters. Our people are everywhere," the head of the Stavropol branch of the RNE, Andrey Dudinov, told Izvestiya.

Dudinov said that RNE supporters can be found in the region's administration, in the Federal Security Service, the successor to the KGB, in the police departments and in the army. The RNE members "do not advertise themselves, but they are doing useful and important work," he added.

Founded in 1990, the paramilitary Russian National Unity group claims to have 25,000 members, though independent observers estimate that membership is much lower. The RNE generally keeps a low profile and has not participated in most federal and local elections.

Experts agree that the RNE, although small, is one of the best-organized groups among Russia's ultr Among other things, RNE has been calling for a ban on interracial marriages.

Those who do not like the new "Russian order" will have to move to other countries, according to their plans. Ultra-nationalists also offer their "solution" to the "Jewish question" in Russia. In an interview with Izvestiya, one of the active members of the RNE Stavropol branch said that those Jews who would be "loyal to Russia" will continue a "normal life" under the "Russian order."

"But [the] majority will leave anyway for America and Israel. So nothing terrible is going to happen."

Two Toronto visitors hurt in old Jaffa

CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — Two visitors from Toronto were attacked by a knife-wielding Israeli Arab last week as they sat in a sidewalk restaurant in old Jaffa.

The attack came shortly after Bakr Abu-Radiya of Nazareth drove into a group of British teenagers who were in Israel for a Jewish Agency summer program.

Altogether, a dozen tourists were hurt in the attacks, but none of the injuries was considered serious.

The Canadians were identified as Eilene Muskat, 45, and her daughter Stephanie, 12. They were treated at Ichilov Hospital and released.

Abu-Radiya was arrested by police officer Daniel Kronson, who said the attacker got out of his car holding a sword and a commando knife, approached the visitors and stabbed them. While in police custody, Abu-Radiya denied recollection of the event.

A consummate politician

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

David Levy has proved yet again that he is Israel's most consummate politician.

In a recent showdown with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Levy — the foreign minister as well as the deputy prime minister — called his bluff and won a significant political victory.

Levy, whose five Gesher party Knesset seats are crucial to Netanyahu's coalition government, threatened to resign over two major grievances.

Levy feared that he would appoint National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon as finance minister and also bring him into the inner circle of senior ministers who formulate policy in peace negotiations with the Palestine Authority.

In addition, Levy was piqued that Netanyahu, a rival with whom he has feuded, had not consulted him about Sharon's meeting with Yasser Arafat's deputy, Mahmoud Abbas.

A prickly man with a monumental ego, Levy confronted Netanyahu on these issues in a bid to shore up his power. In the first instance, Levy felt that Sharon, his former ally, was encroaching on his turf. In the second case, Levy was aggrieved that he had been excluded from the loop.

In a classic display of force and petulance, Levy retaliated. Much to Netanyahu's chagrin, he absented himself from a no-confidence vote in the Knesset, and he let it be known that he might not remain in the government.

Levy's manoeuvres worked. Instead of Sharon, Netanyahu appointed Yaakov Neeman as finance minister to replace the ousted Dan Meridor. And Netanyahu produced a document confirming Levy's primacy in foreign policy and the peace process.

By common consent, Levy, Israel's premier Sephardic politician, is a formidable infighter. Last summer, he put his job on the line twice and prevailed.

Levy, in June 1995, had broken away from Likud over a procedural matter and had formed Gesher with the intention of running against Netanyahu in the first direct election for prime minister. In the interests of denying the Labor party another mandate, Sharon dissuaded Levy and Eitan from challenging Netanyahu. In exchange, the pair were promised second and third place spots in Likud's electoral list and important cabinet posts.

So when Netanyahu tried to exclude Sharon from the cabinet, Levy rebelled, threatening to leave. Netanyahu caved in.

The next crisis occurred in August 1996. Netanyahu's diplomatic advisor, Dore Gold, who has since been named ambassador to the United Nations, upset Levy by holding talks with the Americans and the Jordanians without his knowledge. Compounding the insult, Netanyahu took his first official trip to Amman without Levy.

To compensate Levy for these slights, Netanyahu was forced to draw up new foreign policy guidelines and to create a special steering committee, which has since been disbanded, composed of himself, Levy and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai.

Levy, who immigrated to Israel from Morocco in 1959, has been a member of the Knesset for the past 28 years and a minister since the establishment of the first Likud government in 1977.

Since then, he has been a thorn in the side of two other Likud prime ministers. In the wake of the 1981 elections, he intimated he would not serve in Menachem Begin's cabinet unless he was made deputy premier. Begin succumbed. In 1991, he threatened to resign as foreign minister after Yitzhak Shamir chose to lead Israel's delegation to the Madrid peace conference. Prior to the 1992 election, he resigned, only to return after Shamir gave him the number two spot on Likud's electoral list.

Levy demands respect and ultimately gets it.

Wolman, there as part of a FEDERATION CJA Maccabiah mission, said the tragedy effectively "ruined the games" because the opening ceremonies represented the one moment in which all athletes come together "in the spirit" of the games.

Luxenberg said the tragedy was "devastating;" however, after the first few very difficult days, the spirit level rose anew and paved the way for the Canadian team's best performance ever.

"The focus became the Maccabiah and sports," he said.

Both Wolman and Luxenberg commented on the special role played by Rabbi Sidney Shoham of the Beth Zion Synagogue in Montreal following the tragedy in comforting members of the Australian delegation.

Masada bones belonged to Romans, expert says

By ABRAHAM RABINOVICH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The reburial at the foot of Masada in 1969 of ancient human remains found at the top was one of the most impressive funerals the country has ever seen.

Last week, anthropologist Joe Zias, of the Israel Antiquities Authority, suggested that while the persons buried with full military honors may have been heroes, they were probably Roman heroes, not Jewish.

Archeologist Yigael Yadin, who excavated Masada, had noted in a book he wrote on the dig, said Zias, "that these were the remains of 24 persons thrown into the cave, the last defenders of Masada."

However, in an unpublished report, Yadin recorded the presence of pig bones in the cave in which he found the remains.

Addressing an international congress on the Dead Sea Scrolls, Zias said the presence of the pig bones was not publicly acknowledged until 1981, when Yadin admitted it to a Jerusalem Post reporter.

"I spoke to Yadin, and asked 'How could you say they were Jewish?' said Zias. He said 'I never said they were Jewish.'"

According to Zias, Yadin said he had raised the problem with the chief rabbi, apparently Isser Yehuda Unterman, who asked to think about it. When the rabbi called Yadin back, he said that Jews in the Warsaw Ghetto had brought in pigs to deal with the garbage problem. It was the rabbi's suggestion that the defenders of Masada might have had a similar idea.

"I told Yadin that if they had a garbage problem all they had to do was throw it down on the Romans," said Zias. "He looked at me and I think he agreed."

Apart from the pig problem, Zias was unable to find evidence from the expedition's photographs of more than five victims in the cave, not 24.

Convinced that the burial site was from the Byzantine period, several centuries after the fall of Masada, he subjected a piece of textile found alongside the remains to a Carbon-14 test. To his astonishment, the textile dated to the First Century CE, the time of the fall of Masada. Humbled, he acknowledged in his contribution to the official publication on the excavations, that the bones were probably of the Jewish defenders of Masada.

"No sooner was the ink dry" on that publication, said Zias, he came to regret that assumption. What changed his mind was a sentence he read in a book on Roman burial customs asserting that "only when a pig had been sacrificed [in a Roman funeral] was a grave legally a grave."

Roman soldiers, Zias notes, had remained posted on Masada for some three decades after its defenders died.

"I think there is a high degree of evidence, that those declared the last defenders of the Jewish nation may in fact have been otherwise," he said.

Vatican asked to open archives

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The World Jewish Congress (WJC) is calling on the Vatican to open its archives for an examination of its wartime past.

The WJC issued the call last week after researchers found a declassified U.S. Treasury Department document claiming that the Vatican had stored 200 million Swiss francs — worth about $500 million today — for Croatian fascists after World War II.

In addition to opening the archives, the "Vatican should establish a commission to look into their wartime past — as 16 other countries have done — in view of this incredible documentation," said Elan Steinberg, WJC's executive director.

"The Pope, who has recognized Israel and condemned anti-Semitism, can exert the moral authority to overcome petty bureaucrats who are trying to keep the archives closed and who, in their reaction to the disclosure, sound like a caricature of a Swiss banker," Steinberg said.

His comments came after the Vatican flatly denied that the declassified document had any validity.

"These reports have no basis in reality," chief Vatican spokesperson Joaquin Navarro-Valls said in a statement.

"The information, which is without any documentation, is only based on 'a reliable source in Italy' which, even if it existed, remains unidentified and of dubious authority," Navarro-Valls said.

This is not the first time the Vatican's role in the Holocaust has been questioned by world Jewish leaders. The Vatican has been accused of helping Nazis escape after the war through a so-called pipeline.

Convicted Nazis such as Klaus Barbie, the "butcher of Lyon," and SS Capt. Erich Priebke, who was just convicted of war crimes in Italy, were among those whose escapes reportedly were aided by the Vatican.

The document in question, dated Oct. 21, 1946, was made public by A&E Television Networks, which said producers had found it while doing research for a documentary.

In the document, U.S. Treasury official Emerson Bigelow stated that Croatian fascists spirited about 350 million Swiss francs out of Yugoslavia after the war and that the British impounded only some 150 million.

The document quoted a "reliable source in Italy" that the rest of the money was held in the Vatican "for safekeeping.

"According to rumor, a considerable portion" of the money held by the Vatican "has been sent to Spain and Argentina through the Vatican's 'pipeline,'" the document said, "but it is quite possible this is merely a smokescreen to cover the fact that the treasure remains in its original repository" in the Vatican.

Immigrant ship wreckage sought

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Recent graduates of an Israeli maritime high school have found a novel way to commemorate 100 years of Zionism.

In a project that combines their nautical training with an event in Zionist history, graduates of the Mevo'ot Yam maritime school in Michmoret set sail last week for a small Greek island near Rhodes.

They hope to locate the wreckage of the Rafiah, a boat which, in 1946, was carrying more than 800 illegal Jewish immigrants from Hungary, Romania and Bulgaria to British mandated Palestine, when it sank in a storm.

Some 800 survivors were rescued and taken to internment camps in Cyprus. Thirty people were never found.

"We looked for a way to connect 100 years of Zionism with the four years of nautical education," said one of the participants, Shalom Gutman.

"We hope to bring back some historical artifacts. We will erect a monument there for the victims of the sinking."

Since little documentation was available on the incident, students spent the year piecing together the history of the ship's sinking through the stories of survivors.

"We put together the pieces of the puzzle to find where the ship is," Gutman said.

One of the survivors who worked with the students throughout the year is accompanying them on the trip.

"Shlomo Reichma was born a few days before the Rafiah sank. When it happened, he was thrown into the water, wrapped in blankets like a parcel," Gutman said. "He hopes to somehow learn what happened there, who caught him and saved him, and how he got to Israel."

Summer heat can be a problem

TORONTO — Many older people are forced to limit their outdoor activities during cold, damp or icy weather. But summer is also a time to think about avoiding hot-weather health problems.

"Most sun-related problems affecting older people can be avoided by using common sense and taking a few simple, preventive actions," says Dr. Paula Rochon, a geriatrician at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care who is also an assistant professor in the Department of Medicine at University of Toronto.

Here's some advice from Rochon:

Skin protection — To prevent sunburn and reduce the risk of skin cancer, always apply a sunscreen to all exposed areas of skin before going out in the sun, especially between 11 a.m. and 3 p.m., when the sun's rays are most intense. Look for a product with a Sun Protection Factor (SPF) of at least 15. You should also wear light, loose-fitting clothing made of tightly woven fabrics that cover the arms and legs, as well as a broad-brimmed hat to shade the face, eyes and neck. Sunglasses are also important to help prevent eye damage linked to the development of cataracts.

Medications — Certain prescription and over-the-counter medications can make you more vulnerable to the effects of ultraviolet radiation. This reaction, known as photosensitization, may show up as an unusually severe sunburn. Such a reaction can occur days, or even weeks, after taking the drug and being exposed to the sun. Drugs which can make you more sensitive include some antibiotics, including those often prescribed for urinary infections; some diuretics, often prescribed for high blood pressure or heart disease; and certain drugs used during chemotherapy for cancer treatment. If you take any of these medications, it's wise to check with your doctor or pharmacist before going out in the sun.

Avoid overheating — Each year, hundreds of people are treated for heat-related illnesses such as heat exhaustion and heat stroke. Those at increased risk include the elderly and the very young; anyone with chronic illness, especially heart disease; people who take drugs such as diuretics or water pills which can lead to dehydration; and those who consume excessive amounts of alcohol, which leads to dehydration.

There are three basic types of heat-related illness:

Heat cramps are painful spasms in the arms, legs or abdomen caused by exessive sweating and salt depletion. People on salt restricted diets may be particularly prone to heat cramps during hot weather.

Heat exhaustion, caused by dehydration, leads to changes in body chemistry. Symptoms include fatigue, fainting, weak pulse, headache, nausea, weakness, skin which is clammy, moist, pale or flushed, and a slightly raised body temperature (37.5 to 38.5 C.). Such symptoms should always be reported to your doctor. Treatment includes resting in a cool place and drinking liquids.

Heat stroke, the most serious of these, occurs when the body is unable to cool itself. Symptoms include hot, flushed, dry skin, confusion, disorientation, jumbled speech, convulsions and fainting. Heat stroke, which can lead to brain damage or death, is a medical emergency. Treatment includes moving the person to a cool location and using other measures to lower body temperature.

How can you prevent heat-related illness?

• Avoid strenuous activities when the weather is very hot or humid. Clothing should be light-colored to deflect heat, and loose enough so that perspiration (the body's natural cooling mechanism) can evaporate.

• During very hot weather or exertion, drink small amounts of cool water or other non-alcoholic beverages every 15 to 20 minutes to avoid dehydration. Avoid beverages such as cola, tea or coffee which contain caffeine, a diuretic.

• During very hot or humid weather, try to spend a few hours each day in an air-conditioned house or room, or public place such as a library or indoor mall. Electric fans can be useful, but not if the temperature is higher than 32.2 C. (90 F.) with humidity greater than 35 percent.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I do a lot of barbecuing in the summer. How can I prevent food poisoning?

A. Here are some things to do:

• Ensure that you do not use the same plate and utensils to serve cooked food, as you used to put the raw food on the barbecue.

• Never use the marinade or sauce that the raw meat was sitting in to baste cooked meat.

• Keep food in the refrigerator until ready to cook.

• Refrigerate leftovers as soon as possible after eating.

Q. My 15-year-old daughter was just diagnosed with lactose intolerance. She really enjoys dairy foods and I am worried about the lack of calcium if she eliminates them all from her diet.

A. There is no reason to reduce all of the calcium in her diet. She is at a critical time for building bone mass and needs all the calcium she can get.

People who are lactose intolerant can consume dairy products where the lactose has been fermented. These include soft or frozen yogurts, and all aged cheese. For other dairy products, she will likely have to consume them with pills that provide the lactase enzyme, or she will have to add the lactase drops to her milk. There are also a lot of lactose-free products such as milk, ice cream and cheeses on the market today which are full of calcium.

Q. Which vegetables would qualify as the most nutrient-dense?

Q. Are all foods labelled light, low in fat?

A. No! When a product is advertised as light /lite, it can mean, light in taste, weight, smell, color or appearance, not necessarily light in calories or fat. Make sure you read the label to see what you're really getting.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART 1

Welcome to our annual summer literary column, in which we offer capsule reviews of some new and recent works, and news of upcoming titles.

Tempest in a Shotglass: The literary community is abuzz with opinions as to whether the current Saturday Night magazine contravened any ethical standards by fudging the line between advertising and editorial when it published Barney's Wedding, a section of Mordecai Richler's newest novel.

Absolut Mordecai

The excerpt is from the novel Barney's Version, due from Knopf Canada in September. As Saturday Night's display copy makes clear, it was presented by a corporate sponsor, Absolut Vodka, an arrangement that evidently helped bankroll the author's hefty fee for publication in the magazine, reportedly in the neighborhood of $30,000.

The type on the story's last page divides in the middle to form the outline of an invisible bottle, beneath which a large caption reads "Absolut Mordecai." Apparently it didn't bother either Absolut that the author's trademark drink is scotch, or Richler, whose prose was shaped into a blatant advertisement.

Shrugging off the criticism, editor Kenneth Whyte, publisher Maureen Cavan, honorary publisher Allan Gotlieb and Richler himself are likely laughing all the way to the proverbial bank. And why not? What other publishing ploy could have produced so much publicity?

In all the excitement, the mediocrity of Barney's Wedding has been overlooked. Can readers really maintain interest in such an unsavory character as the hard-drinking Barney who lusts after another woman at his own second wedding? (His father seems even more unsympathetic.) O Mordecai, what a falling off was there! What became of the brash idealism and winning spirit of younger Richler protagonists like Duddy Kravitz?

Two-Gun Cohen: Published by St. Martin's Press, this intriguing biography by Daniel S. Levy is set for an August release by its Canadian distributor, McClelland & Stewart.

The son of Orthodox Jewish parents, the title character was a con man, card-sharp and pickpocket from east-end London who was arrested, sent to reform school and then shipped to western Canada. Hustling and picking pockets as he wandered from Manitoba to British Columbia, Cohen regularly played poker at a Chinese gambling hole in Saskatoon, where he rescued a Chinese man from burglars.

That selfless act earned him the respect of the Chinese community, the friendship of Sun Yat-Sen and, ultimately, even though he never learned Chinese, Cohen — who sported two pistols wherever he went — sailed to China and became a general in the nationalist army.

Times Square Rabbi: Proferring an eight-step program based on the teachings of Maimonides, Rabbi Yehudah Fine prowls the mean streets of Manhattan seeking young people to redeem from their chosen hells.

Fine's gritty realism rings completely true — and it is: this is a non-fiction account of the streetwise rabbi's attempts to find the lost hope in these kids' lives. It's must reading for social workers and anyone concerned with the growing social problem of young people who take to the streets. (Hazelden.)

Call It Sleep: What else might one call the hiatus of 60 years that American author Henry Roth took between publication of his first now-classic novel (Call It Sleep, 1934) and his next (A Star Shines Over Mt. Morris Park, 1994)? Now deceased, Roth has left us with six semi-autobiographical novels that are being published in sequence as part of a sextet called Mercy Of A Rude Stream.

From Bondage, the third instalment, draws us into the life of Ira Stigman and the bohemian world of Manhattan in the 1920s. The narrator describes a love triangle as seen through a glass darkly and from a variety of perspectives: youth, middle age, old age.

A difficult yet rewarding read, From Bondage supposedly fictionalizes the lives of New York literary celebrities like Hart Crane, Louise Bogan and Margaret Mead. It's anybody's guess what the fourth novel will do as an encore. (St. Martin's Press.)

So many books, so little space. Watch for more book news and capsule reviews in this spot next week.

Canadians reminisce about Growing Up Jewish

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A new book, Growing Up Jewish; Canadians Tell Their Own Stories, was launched at the recent Ashkenaz gala at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts.

The evening of klezmer music, comedy and literature was a fitting venue to launch Growing Up Jewish which was inspired by Ashkenaz, according to Rosalie Sharp, the driving force behind the book's publication and a key fundraiser for Ashkenaz, the festival of new Yiddish culture.

She told The CJN she had wanted to incorporate the written word into Ashkenaz, which she described as a multidisciplinary cultural event revolving around story telling in Yiddish. "This book is storytelling. It fits right into the festival."

Growing up Jewish is a collection of the reminiscences of 26 prominent Jewish Canadians, co-edited by Sharp, York University professor Irving Abella and lawyer Edwin Goodman. Charles Bronfman, Julia Koschitzky, Ben Dunkelman, Arlene Perly Rae, Larry Zolf and Rosalie Abella are among the contributors who span several generations and represent a wide spectrum of Jewish backgrounds.

The hard cover book has dozens of vintage photographs and offers both humorous and heart-rending stories. Michael Wex's amusing recollections of growing up Orthodox in a small Alberta town are a sharp contrast to Sharp's poignant musings on shtetl life in the '30s as depicted in letters sent to her family in Toronto from Poland. Her mother's parents and siblings, residents of the Polish shtetl of Ozorow, all perished during the Holocaust.

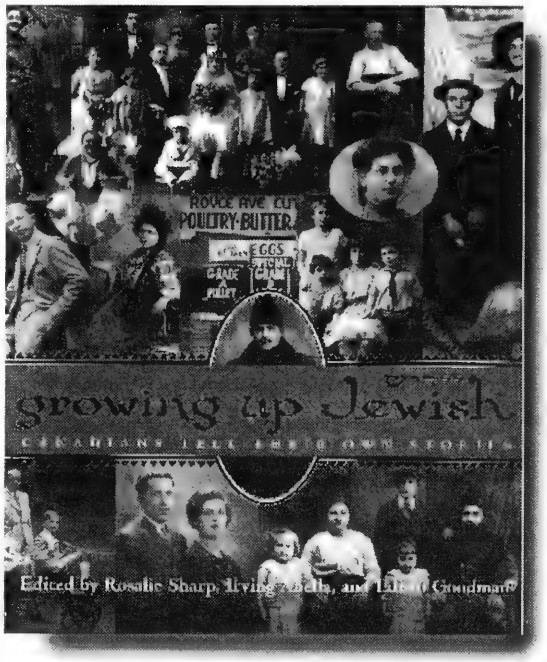
Growing Up Jewish is divided into four parts: the first section covers life in the immigrant community in Canada during the '30s and '40s; many of the stories in the second part deal with Canadian anti-Semitism; the third is about the legacy of grandparents; and the final section focuses on the post-Holocaust era in Canada.

The book was conceived as an alternative to the traditional fund-raising book with ads from well-wishers, Abella said. "We wanted to do something important; something that would have a life beyond the festival."

He said he and Sharp decided to put together a permanent record "outlining the important contributions of Canadian Jewry over the past century." He noted that the three co-editors sought contributions from people who represented various aspects of Jewish life in Canada.

The project started off small and "developed into something quite significant," he said. "Now it's an important historic book."

Growing Up Jewish, published as a public service by McClelland and Stewart, is now available at Jewish and major book stores. All royalties will support Ashkenaz.



This 228-page hardbound book chronicles the reminiscences of 26 prominent Jews from across Canada.

Funny lady lampoons family

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Deb Filler is a funny lady, a comedienne whose acerbic sense of humor is bolstered by a talent for mimicry.

These infectious qualities unfold in Punch Me In The Stomach, a 72-minute film based on her slightly shorter off-Broadway one-woman play. It will be at Montreal's Cinema du Parc (Park Avenue and Prince Arthur) from July 18 to 24.

Filler is the child of a Holocaust survivor, a Polish Jew who settled in New Zealand, a country she jocularly describes as "the land of no blintzes."

The film, directed by Francine Zuckerman, is essentially an exercise in black humor rendered in Kiwi and Polish-Jewish accents. It skirts the globe, passing over New Zealand, Israel and the United States.

Filler lampoons her extended family, sparing neither her father Sol, a baker, nor her German-born mother. And she caricatures the neuroticism of children of survivors, her own included.

Acerbic sense of humor

In an ironic tone, she recalls her status as the only Jewish student in her school, as well as her hellish time in a rain-swept Habonim camp somewhere in the wilds of New Zealand.

To her regret, Israel does not turn out to be much better. A march in the desert, a defining moment, reminds Filler of the camp back home she disliked.

She visits America, and an aunt in New Jersey unburdens herself of the observation that New Zealand is a "cultural desert." Filler probably agrees, judging by her decision to settle in North America.

At the invitation of her father, she accompanies him on a tour of former concentration camps in Poland.

Deb Filler

Considering her perennial exposure to Holocaust stories, Filler's immediate reaction to Auschwitz is not all that strange. She feels as if she has been there before, as if she has known this symbol of unmitigated evil all her life.

And yet Filler's perceptions differ from that of her father. During the course of their trip, she sees a town square, while he envisages Nazis herding Jews into a truck. She glimpses a pristine field of flowers, but he remembers the execution of a French girl.

One does not expect levity in Auschwitz, but Filler somehow finds it in a restroom with a broken toilet chain.

Filler portrays an array of characters in her sketches, which run the gamut from the poignant to the absurd. She is clearly a talented performer, and in Punch Me In The Stomach she is in top form.

Waxman shines in theatre classic

By CELINE MIGDAL
Special to The CJN

STRATFORD — Death of a Salesman, written 50 years ago by Arthur Miller, remains a classic of American theatre.

Canadian actor Al Waxman in the pivotal role of Willy Loman turns his Stratford Festival debut into a personal success. A recent performance of the play elicited three curtain calls. The applause was loudest when Waxman remained on stage, alone.

Portraying the travelling salesman in pursuit of the American dream, Waxman shows how the disillusion of this dream can destroy a man and his family.

Fitting easily into the role, he slowly enters the stage at the opening, carrying his worn sample cases, the embodiment of a man totally spent and defeated by life.

He leaves the stage at the end of the play, planning to kill himself, because he's been fired after working all his life for one firm. He wants to make life better for his favorite son, Biff, who would collect on the insurance policy and make a new start in his own life.

Biff comes to the self-realization at the end of the play that it's his own dream that counts, not his father's. "He's had a false dream of success, all his life — it's what's inside of you, that counts, who you are," he says.

This theme is echoed by Willy's friend and neighbor Charlie who says: "A man is more than just a salary."

Willy's devoted wife, Linda, beautifully interpreted by Stratford veteran Martha Henry, says almost the same thing, when she begs her sons Happy and Biff to pay attention to their father. "A man is not just a piece of fruit that you can discard — attention, attention must be paid to his needs."

The play is still as relevant today as it was 50 years ago because the premise of building one's life on a false dream and devoting it to the company in the hope of success seems just as futile.

Waxman is superb both as the garrulous salesman and proud father, teaching sons, Happy and Biff, his secret of success — "being well liked" — and the lost soul, who tries to plant a garden before killing himself, because "that's the most important thing a man can do."

Waxman is ably supported by Henry, Geordie Johnson as son Biff and Graham Abbey as the younger son Happy.

The simple but effective set is a two-storey open section of a house. Most of the action takes place in the kitchen and the two bedrooms above.

Different lighting is used to separate the present from the flashbacks, giving the play a dream-like quality and making the audience wonder what actually takes place and what's simply in Willy's mind.

The effect is to create a psychological puzzle within a highly political play about capitalism and it's effect on society and family life.

The play continues at Stratford until Nov. 8.

Saul Korman bullish on Greektown

Saul Korman is a quality clothier with customers around the world. He is also a goodwill ambassador for Greektown on the Danforth; and much of the publicity he has given Greektown has enhanced the public image of Korry's Clothiers.

In 1994, the Danforth business community presented Saul with an award to thank him for his efforts in promoting their neighbourhood. At Greektown events, he is often Master of Ceremonies. His live commercials on six radio stations not only make Korry's Clothiers known across the city, but also tirelessly promote the Danforth's wonderful restaurants and shops. This fact obviously endears him to his fellow merchants on the strip, but it springs from his genuine conviction that the Danforth is the place to be. Talk to him in the privacy of his office, and he'll tell you the same things he tells his readership and listening audience. "You'll find fine restaurants across the city," he says, "but you'll never find so many good ones in one place. And how can you duplicate the atmosphere? You can't. If it isn't the Danforth, it isn't Greektown. This street has tachles. Show me a mall that has tachles."

Malls do have free parking, but that only reinforces the Danforth's attractiveness, he says.

A street with tachles

"People tell me that on Thursday and Saturday night, it's hard to find parking down here, even with all the public parking lots we have. Sure it's hard — this is where everyone wants to be. So you circle the block, and you find a spot. Uptown, you eat and you go home. It's over. Here, you eat and you linger, because you have reason to linger."

Restaurants aren't the only attraction on the Danforth, he continues. It's a veritable "gold mine" of fine ladies' wear stores, gift shops, and home accessories boutiques. Almost all of these stores are one-location-only and owner-operated, which helps give the Danforth its inimitable personality.

Saul has seen the Danforth evolve from a fledgeling immigrant neighbourhood to today's vibrant community with its Greek and Eastern Mediterranean flavor. He is quick to praise the hard work and skill of the restauranteurs and other entrepreneurs who have made this community prosper.

"Take a walk along the Danforth," he suggests; "if you're thinking of travelling to Greece, talk to those who were born there."

A walk along the Danforth, of course, is incomplete without a visit to Korry's. It's a welcoming place, and though it's definitely a showcase for fine garments, the attitude is down to earth, the ambience relaxed. Like its owner, it's always charged with energy and activity.

Suit sales brisk even in summer

Saul has enough space and staff to handle his growth in trade, while keeping the personal touch. He employs six alteration staff year-round, even in summer when some dress more casually. "Suits sell, whatever the season," he smiles. He himself spends plenty of time with customers, and supervises the buying of every garment and bolt of cloth.

Korry's has many famous customers, and testimonials from sports and media celebrities. He's often consulted by film and TV wardrobe planners. They know that he can achieve the near-impossible in supplying and fitting — on short notice, meeting the tight schedules of their industries. But if having actors buy their suits from him is a feather in Saul's cap, his greatest testimonial is the large number of men from all walks of life who seek him out in the knowledge they'll get both expertise and value for their men's wear dollar.

Good suits are long-wearing; so, for people to come back soon and often, Korry's offers top service and variety of product. Quality lines sold here include Canali, Hugo Boss, Arnold Brant, Versace Classic V2, and two-for-one suits under Korry's private Roberto label.

"The customer," says Saul, "is the final inspector. His or her satisfaction is paramount."

Saul is grooming his son Michael as his successor, but he's a long way from retirement. "I'm too busy looking forward to look back," he says.

Saul and his staff at Korry's look forward to meeting you and comparing notes, and welcome the opportunity to clothe you in style. Above all, says Saul, "Enjoy the summer; enjoy the Danforth. There's no other street like it."

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Garden of culinary delights

With its striking red brick facade laced with warm green trim, the Athenian Garden is a familiar Danforth landmark.

Indoors or out, the "Garden" exudes casual comfort. From its shady terrace outside to its airily spacious interior dotted with green plants and comfortable wicker chairs, it's a natural, soothing setting in which to enjoy a fine meal.

Partner Andrew Petrou is actively involved in the day-to-day operations of this family restaurant, and takes great pleasure in every facet of the business.

Besides well-known Greek dishes like moussaka and souvlaki, the Athenian Garden offers delectations like Exohiko (baby lamb in filo pastry with romano and feta cheese), Ortykia (quails marinated in olive oil lemon sauce), and Stithos kotas (marinated spiced chicken breast). There is an Italian touch in the fettuccini selection; you will also find a fine choice of appetizers, and an extensive wine list.

Monday to Thursday, "Two Can Dine for $19.99". This special, a menu in its own right, has proven extremely popular for good reason; you'll be hard-pressed to find a comparable dining value anywhere.

You'll find the Athenian Garden at 526 Danforth, 3 blocks west of Pape; open 11 a.m. to 12 midnight daily, Friday and Saturday to 1 a.m. There is a smoking area. Call for reservations, especially on weekends: 465-4001.

All the Colori of the rainbow

Colori, as you might guess, is Italian for "colors"; a single visit underscores just how well the name fits. The decor, while slick and sophisticated, is a happy, playful medley of children's colors — warmly vibrating primaries, pastels and jewel tones as bright as young voices in a summer playground.

The exterior is a sunny yellow, with awnings in deep blue and green over a patio shaded by friendly green plants. The interior is rich orange with contrasting mango and grape trim; the tabletops are in deeper contrasting colors; and the floor varies from gleaming black-and-white tile to warm, burnished hardwood. Stained glass in bright blue, green and yellow borders the tall, wide windows.

In so stunning a setting, anything less than exceptional cuisine would disappoint . . . Colori doesn't. In two short years since its opening in 1995, this little bit of Italy on the Danforth has earned a legion of followers and an enviable reputation for innovative cuisine.

Besides a large antipasto, pasta and pizza selection, Executive Chef Marco Spalvieri's menu offers many bold departures from standard Italian fare. Among the pastas, for example, partner Nick Angelucci recommends Penne San Remo al Cartoccio, a medley of pine nuts, smoked sun-dried tomatoes and infornati olives in a sweet plum tomato sauce, wrapped in parchment paper and baked. Among the entrées, extremely popular is the simple, tasty Oven-Baked Chilean Sea Bass, resting on a brussels sprout and celeriac fricassee.

Megas big on taste and value

True to its name, Megas — a splendid new addition to the Danforth's wonderful collection of restaurants — proves that good things sometimes come in big packages.

Awash with light and colour, Megas is big in all the right ways. Sprawling and spacious, it greets you, open-armed, with a festival of authentic Greek delights. Everything is generously-portioned and reasonably priced, from the appetizers (over 50, including all your traditional favourites) through the salads, entrées and desserts, all prepared from scratch and cooked to perfection in an open kitchen. This is Greektown dining at its finest.

Even Alexander the Great, from whose name "Megas" is derived, would have been impressed by the portions served here

In addition to the offerings you'd expect in a fine Greek restaurant, like roast lamb, a variety of shish kebabs and fresh fish daily, Megas boasts a number of refinements you wouldn't expect, like salads dressed with extra-virgin olive oil they import themselves from Greece, and homemade desserts including fresh baklava and an exquisite cheesecake that owner Nick Kostis proudly proclaims is "the best in town." The menu also includes vegetarian specialties, pasta dishes and kids' items.

Megas seats 180 comfortably, and features an outdoor patio and handicapped washrooms. Daily specials are available for both lunch and dinner, and the wine list is extensive.

When it comes to fine Greek cuisine, Megas has all the answers. Which leaves you with one question: Who needs a Megacity when you've got a Megas?

Astoria defines the Danforth

Think "Danforth", and you're liable to think "Astoria." In the 20 years since it opened, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities the Danforth is known for: great food, great quality, and great value.

Indeed, many of Astoria's original customers are still regulars two decades later, and wouldn't dream of going anywhere else.

The reasons for this loyalty are manifold. First and foremost, the food: your favourite Greek dishes are cooked to perfection and served up in staggering portions. Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. In fact, Astoria has become so well-known for its souvlaki that "people sometimes forget we have a complete Greek menu," says personable manager George Baboulas. Like an actor who plays a part so well he becomes typecast, Astoria has come to be defined by the shish kebob, perhaps hiding other jewels on the menu like its hearty moussaka, exquisite broiled sea bass and salmon steaks – and Greek appetizers like kalamari and saganaki, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location, dual outdoor patios (the Danforth's largest), and quiet, rich green-and-chestnut-brown interior, ingeniously compartmentalized to offer small-room intimacy with a large-room ambience.

Favouring tradition over trends, Astoria has nevertheless introduced a cappuccino machine and a dessert menu. (The fact that it's thrived for 20 years without offering dessert tells you just how much people love the food here).

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria's white facade with its pale blue trim leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to the Danforth" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

In Avli, Greece courts Asia Minor

In many North American ethnic communities, it has recently become fashionable for cooking styles to marry Old World and New; but in the Old World, this blending has gone on for generations. At Avli, owners Sharon Murray and Lambrinos Vassiliou regale you with a blend of the Greek islands and Asia Minor, in the cuisine of Constantinople (also called Istanbul).

In chef Lambrinos' varied menu, cinnamon, balsamic vinegars, black currants and pine nuts flavor many dishes. House specialties include kleftiko lamb pie and lamb shank in sun-dried tomato and wine sauce; the growing seafood menu is fresh daily. Vegetarian dishes include delicacies like lentils with Italian cheese and walnuts.

Main courses are prepared individually for you. The pies are specially cooked, served in individual clay dishes; order them or the lamb shank early. Avli makes its own exquisitely-textured filo pastry — far superior to the prepackaged variety. The wine list is greatly expanded, and the homemade desserts are heavenly. The pièce de résistance is the bougatsa, a generous slice of baked custard, apples and pears wrapped in filo pastry, topped with icing sugar and cinnamon, and served with fresh whipped cream and berries in season. The crême caramel is also highly recommended.

Avli is Greek for courtyard; fittingly, the ambience is peaceful and relaxed. The walls are whitewashed, with shelves holding artifacts in classical Greek style, candle lanterns and bright flowers. Avli is open from 5 p.m. to midnight or later, every day. If you come Friday or Saturday, it's good to make reservations; call 461-9577.

You're walking along the Danforth, minding your own business. Suddenly, you're being served a "Life Sentence" Belgian waffle with chocolate chip ripple ice cream, topped with bananas, fudge brownie, fudge and peanuts.

You're now just another inmate "doing time" at Demetre's Desserts – swallowed up by a vortex of irresistible cones, sundaes, splits, gourmet coffees, cakes — and the best ice cream you ever tasted.

Relax. It's a crime so common that the dessert emporium sells "over 2000 litres of ice cream a week" in peak season, according to partners Dino, George, Jim, and Themy. The fact that it's home-made the old fashioned way (no additives, no preservatives) reduces somewhat the guilt of this unbelievably pleasurable indulgence. Demetre's is one of the very few places you'll find this "Real McCoy", and ice cream connoisseurs from all over Toronto seek it out.

You've served your life sentence, but there's no rest for the wicked. It's time for a "Sweetcar Named Devour" crêpe, with cocoa-chocolate ice cream topped with fresh strawberries and fudge. Wash it down with a cappuccino, espresso, frappé, steamer, or freshly brewed coffee (40 varieties in all).

Now that (s)he's said yes, celebrate with an Aristo-crème dark chocolate truffle sundae (2 scoops of cocoa-chocolate ice cream rolled in chocolate curls, served on a bed of fudge with chocolate chunks and sprinkled with Dutch cocoa powder).

Now that you've enjoyed the main course, it's time for dessert . . .

Mezes rooted in family values

With its bubbling fountain, elegantly pillowed wrought-iron benches, courtyard effect and Greek pottery, Mezes echoes a faraway world that is still vividly etched in owner Sue Zindros' memory. "Growing up, we would sit around the table and share both the day's events and the variety of dishes my mother had lovingly prepared. Sometimes it was just feta cheese, olives and watermelon, but it didn't matter. Forks would fly across the table, but somehow everyone ended up consuming equal amounts. To me that was ideal, because my mother never really knew if I ate all my vegetables." It is through Mezes, Sue says, that she and her sister Christine (the head chef) are able to share these treasured memories with guests.

In keeping with the family spirit, the staff work as a team and exude a genuine affection that is immediately apparent. Mezes is also very child-friendly; don't be surprised if Sue asks to hold your baby and take it for a stroll, or if a staff member engages your youngster in a lengthy chat.

Both Sue and Christine are on the same culinary wavelength — namely, that all dishes be prepared fresh daily to ensure consistently high quality.

The fruits of this teamwork are joyously abundant and evident on your first bite. Try the superbly seasoned fresh whole red snapper or sea bass. Vegetarian dishes are a Mezes forté; highly recommended is the whole grilled eggplant, peeled and sprinkled with feta cheese and green onions and drizzled with extra virgin olive oil. Among the appetizers (mezes) for which the restaurant is named, the feta cheese saganaki (pan fried and flambéed in ouzo) is unsurpassed. And their chicken kleftiko is melt-in-your-mouth delicious: succulent chucks of grilled chicken, topped with spinach and feta cheese, wrapped in filo pastry. The tastes will have you closing your eyes in bliss and comparing them with favourites from your own past.

Mezes is open daily, and supper is served until midnight Sunday to Thursday, until 3 a.m. Friday and Saturday. Reservations are recommended. Mezes is also happy to cater your office parties and other functions.

Mezes is a business, to be sure; but by treating it first and foremost as a vehicle for sharing their cherished experiences, the two sisters have succeeded in going forward by looking back. Whatever your perspective, you'll taste the difference that caring and quality make.

Byzas sets standard for elegance, value

To say that Byzas (derived from "Byzantine" but pronounced "Bee-zas") boasts Toronto's most compelling restaurant interior is no overstatement. A full description would exceed the bounds of this space; suffice it to say that you simply have to see it to fully appreciate it. In the past year alone, scenes from four major motion pictures have been shot there.

Ironically less populated by movie stars than its sister restaurant, Christina's, Byzas nevertheless sees its share of celebrities. World heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield, among others, was recently "roped in" by the Byzas experience.

Those too intimidated by the visual grandeur to venture in are missing out on some of Toronto's finest food values. A case in point is the Roast Rack of Lamb in a three-mustard cream sauce; at only $15.95, served with roast potatoes and seasonal vegetables, it's a culinary "Brinks job". Another steal is the Chicken stuffed with Porcini Mushrooms ($12.95) served with Marsala and Mashed Potatoes. The Byzas Greek Salad ($6.95) with mustard greens, arrugula and baby red oak leaf is a delightful departure from the traditional Greek salad, which is also offered.

On Friday and Saturday nights, Byzas swells with song; a variety of live international music ranging from Greek to Maritime breezes through the dining room and out onto the large open patio. It feels like freedom, and you'll love every minute of it.

Christina's: from cravings to star gazing

Some define a restaurant merely by its ability to satisfy their food cravings. For others, ambience is paramount. Still others insist on live entertainment. A few even like to gaze at the stars (either the celebrity or the celestial variety). It's rare to find one place that combines all of these attributes; but for many Torontonians, Christina's is that place.

Food cravings. In addition to traditional Greek fare — including the best plate of lamb chops you'll find on the Danforth — Christina's solves your Greek/Italian culinary dichotomies by offering wonderful pasta/souvlaki combos. Their filet of sole in a killer garlic sauce is a must-try. And their treatment of salads (romaine and organic baby green lettuce are used instead of leaf and iceberg) is typical of a menu-wide provision of quality ingredients. This is not a fast-food restaurant; you may wait a little longer for your food to arrive, but the wait is well worth it.

Ambience. Christina's oozes character from every pore. Much of that character, of course, comes from the clientele, which echoes Christina's universal appeal; on any given night, you'll find almost as many ethnicities and walks of life as there are patrons.

Live entertainment. Live music and belly dancing are offered on Friday and Saturday night, but the best show is the spontaneous conversation that seems to spread from table to table like wildfire.

Star gazing. Toronto's original late-night spot, Christina's is still open until 4 or 5 a.m. on busy nights, and many entertainment celebrities gravitate to it. Recent sightings include Kirstie Alley, Tony Danza, and Alicia Silverstone of "Batgirl" fame. Those who prefer gazing at the "Big Dipper" will find that Christina's patio, while not the largest on the Danforth, is certainly the most popular; come early if you want to grab a strategic spot.

A Danforth institution most definitely run by the inmates, Christina's is a crazy, wonderful place; until you've done it, you haven't really done the Danforth.

Toronto's Greektown will kick off the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth on Friday, August 8. Running until Sunday August 10, the event is now in its fourth year. Last year, the event attracted over 200,000 visitors. This year it has expanded to require closure of part of Danforth Avenue, from Broadview to Jones Ave.

Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth is a food festival that involves the Danforth's many restaurants and cafés. The emphasis is on Greek cuisine, with the Toronto's Danforth boasting North America's largest Greektown. But with Toronto known worldwide for its cosmopolitan makeup, even Greektown features Mexican, British, Chinese and Italian cuisine.

During the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth, more than 70 restaurants will have a featured menu item for sale just outside their door, for just $1 to $3. Patrons use special $1 Royal Bank coupons for their purchases, with 20% of each coupon being donated by the restaurant to the Toronto East General Hospital and other charities. Royal Bank Sampling Coupons can be obtained from the Royal Banks located from Lake Ontario to Eglinton, Don Valley to Victoria Park for two weeks prior to the event. They will also be sold by Toronto East General Hospital volunteers on Danforth Avenue during the event.

There's more to the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth than just great food. It's a family event with a children's area, a sports arcade, four beer and wine gardens, and live music. A variety of buskers and other streetside entertainment rounds out the experience.

Enjoy the music. Try your hand at the batting cage, shoot a hoop, sink a putt — or just enjoy the sights, sounds and shopping along the Danforth, fast becoming known as a centre for European fashion in the city. Or win a Trip for Two to Greece compliments of Regent Holidays and Papas International Travel and Tours.

If you're looking for a souvenir, take home a special "Taste of the Danforth" cookbook, with proceeds going to the local community college whose design students produced it.

The Danforth is served by Toronto's award-winning TTC, and even by special tourist trolleys that pick up from the major downtown hotels. Taking the subway or the trolley is definitely the better way.

With over a quarter of a million visitors expected this year, the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth is one of Toronto's signature events. Admission is free, the food is exquisite, plentiful and inexpensive, and there's activity, music and plenty of local colour to round out your visit. Opa!

The Palace exceeds expectations

What's in a name? In the case of The Palace, everything. Though "palace" suggests something splendid, the reality is actually a little better. On the main floor, a warm, cozily stuccoed room girded by massive pine beams fairly glows with the promise of a superb feast. On the second level above, the same wonderful ambience is bathed in natural light from all directions — sprawling skylights above, and huge windows wrapping the room on two full sides. This space accommodates 15 to 100 people for birthday parties, graduation parties, and other happy occasions. Throughout the restaurant, the warm glow of pine is omnipresent, from the window trim to the massive railings to the comfortably upholstered solid wood chairs. Accents of leather and wrought iron enhance the coziness, as do the many pieces of original art that festoon the walls.

THE PALACE RESTAURANT
(416) 463-3393

The entire place, in fact, looks like a picture from a children's fairy-tale book. It's a fitting scenario, since partners Peter Hadjis and Napoleon Zacharakis have devoted their 50-plus years in the restaurant business to making customers' culinary dreams come true.

Fresh fish and seafood are a specialty, and here you'll find the largest selection on the Danforth. Filet of sole, red snapper, salmon steak, rainbow trout, sea bass — you name it, The Palace has it, all grilled or broiled to perfection. Seasonal offerings include fresh halibut, swordfish and grouper, and calamari is available both as an entrée and as an appetizer.

The rest of the menu offers an embarrassment of riches. Try the oven-baked stuffed lamb, and you'll know you're in heaven. The moussaka is also exquisite. The Palace even offers a selection of special entrées that must be ordered in advance, including many non-mainstream dishes you won't find anywhere else.

Attention to detail is the keynote here, and it speaks of caring. You can feel it in the way you're greeted when you enter; you can see it in the physical environment, even in the menu itself: thick, richly-textured paper as opposed to the usual plastic. Finally, and most importantly, you can taste it in each and every dish you order.

RENATE GOLDHAAR, née Seelenfreund born in Rendsburg, Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, on December 4th, 1934, is cordially requested to contact me under the following address: Eva Hoffmann, Hans Böckler-Str. 78, 65199 Wiesbaden, Germany. It would be equally appreciated to hear from any other person who can help with information regarding Renate Goldhaar. My name is Eva Hoffmann. I was born in Stettin in 1932 and I attended school in Rendsburg from October 1939 - 1953. As a journalist, I have worked and lived in Wiesbaden since 1962. At the end of the eighties, I made a documentary film about Jewish families who had lived in Rendsburg during the Nazi time. Memories of these families were still vivid in the minds of some citizens there. Since 1994, I have been studying History & Jewish Studies in order to enable me to deal with the Jewish History of Rendsburg, in a scientific way. I frequently visit Rendsburg and have my second place of residence there. Please send all correspondence to my following address: Hans Böckler - Str. 78, 65199 Wiesbaden, Germany.

Canada records best-ever Maccabiah showing

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Maccabi Canada's (MC) 300-member team "rose above the tragedy" of the opening ceremonies bridge collapse and put in their best team performances ever at the 15th edition of the Maccabiah Games, MC officials reported.

The highlight for the Canadian team seemed without question to be the gold medal in hockey, featured at the Games for the first time.

But the Games also included team gold medals in men's basketball (against Great Britain) and men's softball (against Mexico), and silver medals in water polo and men's tennis doubles.

"There's no doubt about it. Canada was the talk of the games," said MC national athletic committee chair, Bob Luxenberg, from Israel. "These are types of medals we've never had before.

"These games will go down as having had a horrible tragedy, but also as being the best for competition."

After the first puck was dropped by hockey legend Jean Béliveau, the Canadian pucksters, coached by former Montreal Canadiens coach Jacques Demers, virtually cruised to the gold in round-robin play against Israel, Ukraine and the United States, going undefeated in five games.

The hockey series included one rout, 19-2, against Ukraine and a come-from-behind victory against the Americans after being down 3-0. The Canadians outscored the opposition 57-10 over the five games.

The final game, a 6-1 victory over the U.S. before hundreds of Canadian supporters at the Canada Centre in Metulla, included three goals by Florida Panthers rookie and team MVP David Nemirovsky, three assists by his brother Mikhail, and a goal for the fourth straight game by Cory Pecker.

Jamie Sokolsky, who plays for the Ontario Hockey League's Owen Sound Platers, was named the best defenceman of the tournament.

The men's basketball team which won a gold medal was coached by Concordia University's John Dore and assisted by Johnny Elias.

In the final game against Great Britain, Alex Bougieff scored 28 points and was named tournament MVP. He was backed up by Andrew Bier, with 15 points, and Victoria, B.C.'s Seth Adler, with 12.

For Luxenberg, there were many other highlights, including:

• Montreal swimmer Chantal Harrison's third straight Maccabiah gold in the 200-metre butterfly;

• A first Canadian silver medal in men's tennis doubles, garnered by Montreal's David Abelson and Toronto's Charles Wright;

• A gold medal in women's tennis doubles for Ontario's Paula Marcelli;

• A gold medal in fencing for Montreal's Dandro Di Cori;

• A first Canadian bronze medal in women's single's tennis by B.C.'s Shiera Stuart;

• A first Canadian silver medal ever in water polo;

• A gold in judo for Winnipeg's Olia Berger;

Other very strong events for the Canadians included swimming and track and field, wrestling, rowing and tae kwon do.

But other efforts fell a bit short of aspirations. The soccer team, for example, finished sixth out of seven teams because of a loss to the Russians in the quarter-finals. The Russians eventually won the gold.

There were also high hopes for the mini-football team; but it finished fifth out of six teams.

Sport by sport in the open senior category, the results were:

• Men's basketball — team gold.

•Fencing — Sandro Di Cori, gold.

• Ice hockey — team gold.

• Judo — Olia Berger, gold; Andrea Mendell, bronze.

• Rowing — Adam Berger, silver and bronze; Felix Soibelman, two bronzes; Ari Taub, two bronzes and a silver; Jeremy Gould, bronze; Roman Elinson, bronze; and Nanci Schipp, bronze.

• Sailing — Jason Kobrick, bronze; Rolf Wagschal, bronze.

• Softball — team gold.

• Swimming — Saròn Werner, two silvers, two bronzes; Chantal Harrison, one gold, two silvers, two bronzes; Barbara Bonder, two silvers, three bronzes; Debbie Werner, two silvers, one bronze; Jason Singer, two bronzes; Danny Heuman, one bronze; Michael Weber, one bronze; Avi Mednick; three bronzes; Peter Ackman, two bronzes; Kevin Gordon; one bronze; Aaron Lightman, one bronze.

• Triathlon — Joanne Kay, gold, silver; Allison Meadow, silver; Shawna Novak, bronze; Syd Kastner, silver.

WE'RE NUMBER ONE!

Canada's Maccabiah hockey team celebrate their gold medal win in traditional style. They were supported by a motley assortment of hockey fans who sported their allegiance close to the chest (bottom). In other sports, Canada's beach volleyball duo of Jack Serlin and Dan Padva finished out of the medals, though they managed to beat Venezuela 15-6 in this match. The women's basketball team, making its debut at the games, also failed to win a medal. They lost to Israel, 54-43, despite this player's stylish layup. Meanwhile in track and field, junior athlete Jesse Sternberg cools off after winning the 200-meter event. Greg Hutner prepares to wack the ball in junior squash while Michael Matthews shows off his golf technique. [Israel photos]

About families

Dear Susan,

My mother-in-law has recently become widowed and we are planning to take her with us on part of our family vacation. She tends to play the martyr and is acting quite disinterested in the trip, but I am convinced that deep down she is flattered to be coming. Do you have any suggestions about how we can get her more enthusiastic and involved?

Dear Reader,

I think it is wonderful that you are taking your mother-in-law on part of your vacation. Your willingness to include her in activities that would normally be reserved for yourself, your spouse and your children shows an enormous amount of love and generosity on your part, and on theirs.

It is quite likely that your mother-in-law's apparent lack of enthusiasm is related to her need to grieve the recent loss of her husband. She may even believe that she would be a burden to your family. There is also probably a certain amount of fear and perhaps guilt, given that she would be taking her first vacation since the death of her husband. The first year following the death of a spouse can be very traumatic, with conflicting, confused emotions.

You may want to acknowledge her reluctance and confusion in the light of your father-in-law's recent passing. This will give her permission to examine and express her feelings. Acknowledge the difficult transition she is going through, and how personal landmarks over the coming year, such as her anniversary, birthdays, the Jewish New Year and Passover, will be especially tough. Assure her that you and your family are there to support her as she moves through the healing process. Above all, don't rush her, as bereavement is a complex process.

You may want to coach your children as to how to approach their bubbie. Grandchildren can have a wonderful and unique ability to comfort and console that can prove invaluable.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 18 years.

Carnage in Jerusalem

BY VIVA PRESS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — At the time that the two bombs went off at Machane Yehuda, I was sitting on bus 14 on my way to Jerusalem's new central bus station.

The bus had just passed Hamashbir, a shopping area on King George Street, and it was making the turn onto Jaffa Road, just a short ride from the Machane Yehuda shuk (market). When the blasts sounded, I assumed the air force was training and that airplanes had broken the sound barrier.

It was only when the bus turned the corner that I realized it could not have been airplanes that had made the noise. As the bus continued up Jaffa Road, a convoy of police cars wailed past us. Behind them were the army jeeps, and following them the ambulances.

The people on Jaffa Road were running — some towards Mahane Yehuda, others away from it. When the bus stopped on Jaffa, some people got off and others got on. A man in a pink shirt and wearing a white knitted kippah was noticeably shaken as he walked down the aisle of the bus telling the passengers that there had been explosions in Mahane Yehuda. By this time, we didn't need him to tell us; the scene unfolding on the streets outside the bus told us what was happening.

When the bus reached the Jaffa and Kiah intersection, it was stopped by the police, who were trying to redirect traffic and stop it at the same time.

A soldier got on the bus and instructed the driver not to let anyone off. Then the soldier got off and returned to helping the police clear the

Nothing has changed: caught in a trap

By YOSEF LAPID
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

This week's double suicide bombing in Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market said it all, yet told us nothing. It said that we're damned if we do and damned if we don't.

After the funerals are over, our grief and pain for the killed and-maimed, the fury we feel toward the terrorists, and our own seething impotence will all give way to sober reason and reflection.

At that point, it will become clear that nothing has changed, that the security and peace situations remain as they were. In other words, it is a situation of deja vu.

The Right will be justified in claiming that peace is not possible as long as even one single Palestinian does not renounce these heinous acts of terrorism; the Left will be justified in claiming that attacks like last week's aim to derail the peace process, and we shouldn't give the terrorists what they want. We're caught in a trap.

Whoever sent the suicide bombers to Machane Yehuda was well aware that the market is a right-wing stronghold. The lethal message they delivered was a warning to Benjamin Netanyahu: Beware the boast that terrorism has stopped. It was also a signal to Arafat: Don't think you can eradicate terror to curry favor with the Jews.

In the Knesset and the cabinet, it will be claimed, vociferously, that the Oslo accords were a mistake, a fata morgana. We made a bargain:

Land in exchange for no more terrorism – but they didn't deliver.

Arafat's condolence telephone calls to Netanyahu are useless. He can't stop the attacks, or he won't; it's all the same.

The Right will say we must tell the Palestinians that the Oslo accords are null and void,

Historian to probe Nazi gold allegations

By STEPHEN BINDMAN
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Bank of Canada has appointed an Ottawa historian to further probe allegations that its vaults were used to launder thousands of kilograms of gold plundered by the Nazis during World War II.

The central bank's swift action brought immediate praise from Jewish leaders, though serious questions remain about the complex paper transactions that took place in 1942 and 1944.

Irving Abella, former president of the Canadian Jewish Congress and incoming president of the Canadian Historical Association, lauded the Bank of Canada's decision to hire Carleton University history professor Duncan McDowall to investigate its wartime transactions in the laundering of gold looted by Germany.

"He's a very reputable historian. He's worked on financial institutions and has written three books. He's a trustworthy man and I'm pleased he was chosen," Abella said.

McDowall told The CJN he hopes to finish his investigation by mid-October but won't be pressured by anyone.

"I will be finished when I feel I have covered all the bases," said McDowall, who has written several books, including an award-winning history of the Royal Bank.

McDowall praised the Bank of Canada for being "completely open" and said he has been promised full access to 50 cubic feet of ledgers, correspondence and internal memos.

"While I think they probably are displaying a basic Canadian integrity and decency which we're all usually fairly proud of in this country, I think they're wary of the public relations disaster that has befallen the Swiss commercial banks. Although they would have done that in the first place without the Swiss example, they don't want to tread that path."

The forensic historian said his probe won't be a vendetta or a witch hunt, but a "salutary investigation."

"We are trying to reconstruct the events of a half century ago. If there's any kind of malfeasance involved here, the intent I would think would be that it not be replicated again."

Finance Minister Paul Martin also threw his weight behind the investigation. In a letter to Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Martin pledged that his department will cooperate fully with McDowall's probe to ensure that "all the pertinent information is reviewed in a coordinated and transparent fashion."

The investigation was triggered by a series of declassified U.S. intelligence documents discovered by the World Jewish Congress which revealed the central banks of Portugal and Switzerland swapped tonnes of gold looted by the Nazis for clean gold held in the Bank of Canada and Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

A preliminary investigation by the Bank of Canada confirmed part of the transaction described in the U.S. documents and added three new players: the federal Finance Department and the central banks of Sweden and England.

It found:

• Gold owned by the Bank of England was moved to Canada before and during the war for safekeeping in the vaults for the Bank of Canada because England feared an invasion.

• To raise needed cash for the war effort, ownership of a portion of this British-owned gold was transferred from the Bank of England's account in Ottawa to the account of the Swiss central bank in exchange for Swiss francs. Later, ownership of the gold was transferred to the Portuguese central bank's account. In all, six tonnes of gold were transferred from the Swiss to Portuguese accounts.

• Further transactions transferred ownership of the gold to the account of the Swedish bank. "All of the transfers were paper transactions on the accounts of the Bank of Canada. At no time does this gold appear to have left the vaults of the Bank of Canada — only the ownership changed."

The review also confirmed some federal involvement outside the Canadian central bank — Finance Department approved the opening of the gold account for the Portuguese central bank before the gold was transferred there from the Swiss account. Finance officials were concerned about the possibility of gold falling into enemy hands and imposed a series of restrictions on its transfer.

But the preliminary report said there was so far no evidence that Canada physically received gold from Switzerland or Portugal, nor shipped gold to those countries during the war.

Students mourn victims

By REVA KAISER

TORONTO — Last week's suicide bombings in the Machane Yehuda marketplace prompted a quick response from university students in Toronto.

The impromptu memorial was organized by Moshe Morris and David Moscovitch, the political action coordinators of the Jewish Student Union of University of Toronto.

"We've come here to condemn acts of terror and violence…and [to support] a peaceful resolution to the Middle East conflict," Morris said in the opening remarks of last Wednesday's memorial.

The memorial service was punctuated by a prayer for peace for the State of Israel, Shir Lamaalot (Psalm 121) and the K'El Maleh Rachamim, the latter two recited by Rabbi Benjamin Jacoby.

Irit Waidergorn, consul of Israel to Toronto and Western Canada, spoke briefly and then lit 12 yahrzeit candles laid out in a row. A moment of silence was observed followed by the singing of Hatikvah for the latest casualties of the "peace" process.

From the editor's desk

Despite slaughter, we must reject despair

I write these words barely hours after the two Jew-hating murderers served their God yet again in Jerusalem in the all too familiar Hamas way – by taking Jewish life; barely hours after the first broadcasts of the stomach-wrenching scenes of severed limbs and blood-splattered pavement; barely hours after the first fury of outrage and the first sigh of revisited sorrow.

Outrage and sorrow, it seems these past many months, have been the constant companions of our hopes and aspirations, constraining them, confining them, ensuring they do not rise into any nearby horizon.

But hopelessness is despair's footman and despair, defeat's guarantor.

If Jewish history teaches us anything, it is to abjure despair. With all our strength and all our will, despite the repeated shedding of tears, despite the surrealism of normal life in the middle of slaughter, and despite the absurdity of sun and blue sky against a backdrop of terror-stricken mayhem and shredded bodies, we must always abjure despair.

In the wake of the killings at Machane Yehuda, words seem more vanity than imperative. But as a way of personally abjuring despair, I offer readers the following items that recently came across my desk.

I recently received a letter from a friend, a survivor, in which she enclosed a copy of a small piece of prose which she had read on the Internet.

The prose is a poignant personal account by someone reflecting on how words of the Holocaust can enter one's ear.

It was entitled A Horrible Beautiful Place.

My friend sent it to me because, in her words, "it is a testimony to all those aging volunteer survivors who share their painful story..."

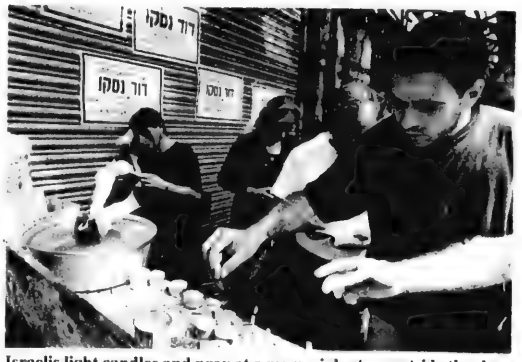
I reproduce part of that prose.

"My introduction to the Holocaust was typical of most kids growing up in Canada. It consisted of that one film they showed in history class from about Grade 9 on into Grade 13. It showed the bodies of the Jews being bulldozed into mass graves. The image remained with me, but the whole thing was unreal. It was just some film.

"I guide canoe trips during the summer. This past summer, I guided a trip through Algonquin Park's Barron River. The river winds through one of the deepest canyons in Ontario.

"There were two sisters along with us. One of them sat in the bow of my canoe. She seemed about 70 years old and as we passed through the magnificent canyon she began to talk. Not so much to me, because I was unseen in the back of the canoe, but to these huge granite cliffs that have been scarred by glaciers. She spoke in a whisper but because of the depth of the canyon her words echo.

"She said in a heavy accent: 'My father would love this place. He was a naturalist. I would hike in the mountains with him and my sister... When the Nazis came in '39...they put us in the ghetto six months later, and then my sister and I were sent to concentration camp. I never saw my father again...'



Israelis light candles and pray at a memorial set up outside the shop of David Nesko, one of 13 people killed in the twin suicide bombings in Jerusalem's central market.

"I stop paddling and let us drift by the walls of the canyon. That image of the bodies being bulldozed into the mass grave comes back to me. Her father...a man who would love this place like I do, was in that pile. That movie is now very real to me. That horror is now a part of me.

"We slip past the rocks. Her words echo as we move and there is only one other noise. It is in the distance and it serves as a drum beat to her lyric. The Barron River is also known for its proximity to the artillery range at the Petawawa military base. This Holocaust survivor's words enter my ears at the same time as the sounds of an army practising for war. Artillery punctuates her tale. The canyon has become a horrible, beautiful place.

"The evil of war has become real to me and still haunts this woman even in one of the most beautiful places on earth."

A Horrible Beautiful Place is testimony to the power and the importance of testimony.

The July 24 issue of the Jerusalem Report contains a small article on the demographics of the Jewish people.

The very first paragraph is like a punch to the solar plexus. It makes one catch one's breath.

"The world Jewish population will never again reach the pre-World War II total of 16.5 million, according to research at the Institute of Contemporary Jewry at the Hebrew University...

"According to...projections, world Jewry will not recover numerically from the Nazi-era death of the six million. It has grown from a postwar total of 11 million to 13 million...but while Israel's Jewish population is on the rise, Diaspora numbers are falling."

For those of us who cherish our Jewishness and who hold as a high privilege our sense of belonging to this people, such authoritative projections are very worrisome if not devastating.

In contrast to feelings of worry and devastation is the apparent attitude of Mordecai Richler.

In a republication of a column which first appeared in the Montreal Gazette, the Toronto Star carried a piece by Richler on July 28, in which the noted humorist shared his thoughts on that very same subject, namely, the future of the Jewish people.

Richler's stock-in-trade is irreverence and satire. Sometimes it works; sometimes it does not.

In my opinion, in the instance at hand, in the column which the headline writer entitled Declining Jewish birthrate isn't my fault, it fails miserably.

He crosses the line, trading with his favorite stereotypical coin of "What will the gentiles think?"

In the process, he proves the very point at which he was attempting to scoff. MBD

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress has joined in a complaint to the Canadian Judicial Council over a remark by a Federal Court judge that allegedly discriminates against Jews and native people.

The complaint, originally filed by the Samson Cree Nation of Alberta, focuses on a statement made in May by Associate Chief Justice James Jerome in which he said he would not appoint a Jewish judge to hear a case involving war crimes or an aboriginal judge to hear a case involving aboriginal matters.

"If these alleged remarks were made, they were indeed discriminatory and displayed an unwarranted bias towards aboriginal peoples and members of the Jewish community," states a letter of complaint to the Judicial Council from Congress president Goldie Hershon.

"This is a very serious matter," said Bernie Farber, Congress' national director of community relations. "It feels like there should be a religious means test" to determine which judge should hear a case. "Where do you draw the line? Does that mean that women can't sit on a case dealing with sexual assaults?"

Mel Buffalo, consultant to the Samson Cree Nation, said "there was a perception from our side of racist overtones...We thought it was ludicrous. It's something we never heard of happening in the past."

Buffalo, who also serves as president of the Indian Assocation of Alberta, said Supreme Court of Canada judges who worked as corporate lawyers do not refuse to hear cases involving corporate law. "There are probably other examples," he said.

Jerome is no stranger to controversy. He was the judge hearing a case involving three alleged Nazi war criminals. The case became sidetracked following a stay application by lawyers for the three suspects.

The stay application was granted by Judge Bud Cullen after it was revealed that a senior Justice Department official met with Federal Court Chief Justice Julius Isaac to complain about the slow pace of proceedings in Jerome's court. Jerome later withdrew from the case. Cullen's decision was overturned. The case is now before the Supreme Court.

As associate chief justice, Jerome has responsibility for assigning judges to cases. The case involving the Samson Cree Nation dates to 1989 when the native group took the federal government to court for alleged breach of trust obligations in the management of oil and gas resources.

In May, 12 weeks before the trial was finally to begin, government lawyers asked that the judge assigned to the case, Douglas Campbell, be removed because he was acquainted with three members of the Samson Cree Nation. It was during discussions with lawyers for the parties about that request that Jerome made the remark about Jewish and aboriginal judges.

Although she would not discuss the Jerome complaint specifically, Jeannie Thomas, executive-director of the Judicial Council, said the judges' group has the authority to order a formal investigation into complaints of serious misconduct. However, the Judicial Council does not have the power to impose penalties or other sanctions. In a case of the most serious judicial misconduct, the most it can do is recommend to parliament that the judge be removed from the bench, she said.

CBC apologizes for offensive remark

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The CBC and one of its commentators have apologized for an on-air remark in which the color analyst used the term "Jewed" to describe a monetary transaction.

The comment prompted a slew of apologies that began during the initial broadcast. Moments after Tallman made the remark, CBC host Ron Maclean went on the air to apologize. A day later, the CBC issued a public "Notice of Apology," in which it described Tallman's remark as "offensive and inappropriate." The same day, Alan Clark, head of television network sports for the CBC wrote to Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress again apologizing.

'It struck us as heartfelt. They saw that an error had been committed.'

The letter included a statement from Tallman that acknowledged, "It is very unfortunate that I said something during the Stampede coverage that was so offensive. I have commented and promoted rodeos in Canada for 23 years and by no means would I want to hurt anyone. For that I am deeply sorry."

Hal Joffe, national chair of Congress' community relations committee, said the apologies should put the matter to rest.

Although Congress would have preferred that Tallman go on the air during a sports news broadcast and apologize himself, Joffe said, "We're pleased the way the CBC dealt with it...It struck us as honest and heartfelt. They saw that an error had been committed."

He suggested, however, that "the fact this phrase is in [Tallman's] lexicon shows the need for education."

Tallman's remark was not the first anti-Semitic slur that has been made during a live broadcast.

A few years ago, CFRB sports announcer Bill Stevenson made an anti-Semitic remark on air and apologized for it only minutes later. TV personality Dini Petty used the term "Hymie" in one of her shows and also apologized the next day for the comment.

Joe Bowen of The FAN all-sports radio used a fictitious Jewish name when describing the high cost of parking near SkyDome. It took eight months for Bowen to apologize.

"That was an example of how not to deal with the situation," Farber said.

JF&CS workshops lend helping hand to those in need

Over the course of several recent weeks, CJN reporter Ron Csillag was permitted to observe four different ongoing workshops conducted by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS).

The sessions exemplified some of the services the agency provides, dealing with the broad scope of problems within the Jewish community. The identities of the participants are not revealed, in keeping with an agreement with JF&CS.

TORONTO — Six abused Jewish women sit in a semi-circle, sipping coffee and nibbling cookies. They range in age from their mid-30s to late

Feature

50s. At least one is Orthodox. There's a discomfort in the air when they are told a reporter from The CJN is sitting at the back of the room as a "fly on the wall," to observe the session.

At first, a tense silence hangs in the air like a fog. Then, little by little, the women begin opening up, prodded gently by social worker Gail Gould. Hesitatingly, they start with bits and pieces of what happened over the past few days and weeks, speaking calmly and nonchalantly about events many of us would consider a nightmare. Physical, verbal, sexual, emotional abuse, and even death threats from spouses, combine with harrowing tales of police indifference and a maddeningly complex bureaucracy.

Throughout, there's a distinct subtext: that somehow, all this shouldn't be happening among Jews, that Jewish men don't hit their wives and that shalom bayit (peace in the home) should prevail.

Responds another, with a cynicism that shoots through the entire session, "Well, we're Jewish. We do it so well."

Some of these women have been in abusive relationships for two years and the weekly two-hour session is an opportunity to vent spleens to empathetic ears. JF&CS says its caseload averages 300 abused women at any given moment. The incidence of abuse in the Jewish community is no lower than in the general population, and an estimated 10 percent of cases go unreported.

Most of these women are at the end of their rope. Through a haze of tears and rage, they describe a pastiche of horror: beatings, emotional blackmail, using children as bargaining chips and withholding money. They are angry. One confesses to being angry at God. But they all agree that abuse is not about violence or hatred. It's about control.

Cultural differences come into play. One older woman says her extended family has told her that her husband's abuse is her fault for not fulfilling her role as a "traditional Jewish wife."

Scoffs a younger woman: "As long as you do their laundry and cook, they don't leave."

Special contempt seems reserved for lawyers and inactive police. The women speak with authority about which police precincts are sympathetic and which brush off the problem without laying charges.

Facing penury

Divorce is never easy. Courts move at a snail's pace. Soon-to-be ex-husbands erect obstacles, like forcing the women to cough up old tax forms and other hard-to-find documents. A get (a decree of divorce issued by a beit din) is a special problem. In the meantime, the women, who have depended on their husbands for so long, face penury. Some have had to borrow money from parents, family and friends.

The children seem to be the ones most adversely affected by all this. The women have noticed marked changes in their kids. Many are having trouble at school and at home and are themselves showing signs of self-destructive and abusive behavior.

Throughout the hellish maze of furtive emergency room visits, expensive legal bills and a Jewish community that in large measure is still in denial when it comes to abuse, the women say their own physical and mental health is deteriorating.

"What it comes down to," sighs one woman just before the session wraps up, "is a lack of control. I'm just out of control."

A lone sock lying on the floor can be a source of tension. An interrupted favorite TV show can trigger fireworks. Never mind when one of you is on time and the other is perennially late.

A six-week JF&CS marriage workshop gives young Jewish couples about to tie the knot a little forshpeiz of what to expect once the wedding guests leave.

It may look like a touchy-feely exercise, but the seven couples seem to benefit from the 90-minute evening session, this one dedicated to good communication — the key to a healthy union.

Social worker Nancy Kumer leads the group, all in their mid to late 20s, in a freewheeling exploration of communication. Poor communication is cited, she says, as the leading cause of marriage breakdown.

After a game of broken telephone, in which half the message is lost, the couples begin to appreciate the importance of communicating clearly. A central theme is "blocking" — inhibitors to effective communication, like ordering, judging, moralizing and saying "yes, but..."

"Active listening" is stressed. Partners face each other and one speaks about something that is troubling him or her, without the other interrupting. The roles are then reversed and some conversations get quite animated. Things get a bit heated when one couple actually gets into an argument over tardiness; the man had arrived late for the workshop while the woman sat, steaming.

The couples then delve into a touchy area: each other's shortcomings, both real and perceived — accusations of nagging, being dismissive of one's feelings and division of housework. Surprisingly, there's little discussion of sex and money, traditionally considered the most contentious issues in a new marriage. Rather, the workshop stresses the need to air dirty laundry quickly and effectively. Even trivialities, if left untended, can fester into major sore points.

Despite the seriousness of the subject, there's laughter and joking throughout the session. Said one couple, "It's fun and light-hearted, but we do learn a lot about each other and what we can expect inside our marriage. We think we know each other, but often, we don't."

For two hours, members of the Bagel Club exchange small talk, drink coffee and, of course, eat bagels. The banter is mostly jovial, revolving around everyday matters like shopping and bus routes. Coming Jewish holidays are also explored.

These people are described as isolated. They don't get out much and have problems in social situations. But one would barely know it from this session. Everyone seems reasonable, even down to the jokes about medication. The CJN reporter is constantly offered another bagel and refills on coffee.

Members hardly look up when two of the men get into a verbal fray about seating arrangements and a spilled drink. One of them then shouts some recriminations, vows never to return and leaves, slamming the door.

"It happens," says social worker Tammy Mahl. "It's more important for these people to get out of their homes and have someplace to go, to talk and socialize." It's not therapy, she stresses, just a simple exercise in human contact.

Wearing extra-baggy jeans, tight-fitting tops and baseball caps pulled down tightly over their eyes, the seven boys and five girls in the Youth in Care group are jaded, even for people twice their age. As Crown wards and society wards (temporary, voluntary care), these kids, ranging in age from 13 to 20, have already experienced more problems and difficulties than most of us do in a lifetime.

The session begins with issues typical of teenagers: school, dating and part-time jobs, and the patter is replete with teen lingo. But things soon escalate into heartbreaking stories of foster parents, group homes and general feelings of rootlessness.

Half the group live in foster homes and the other half, the older ones, live independently. Those in care have been shunted from one foster home to another for years — not exactly conducive to lasting relationships.

"I've been moved around so many times," says one boy, "that I'm tired of making relationships."

Offers an older girl: "You just can't get too attached."

Other emotions range from professing love for foster parents to vows of never returning to a foster family.

They come from varied backgrounds, but all have experienced dysfunction at home, whether violence or their parents' inability to care for them. For years, they've been exposed to a social welfare system that's tearing apart at the seams and to a constant shortage of Jewish foster homes.

Social workers Ian Wine and Cindy Smolkin acknowledge these young people have have plenty on their plates.

One young woman, mature beyond her 18 years, sums up the relationship between foster parents and foster children: "We're not their kids. Foster parents should know the kid they're getting has problems. No kid is perfect."

Canadians heading to 'Olympics of the Mind'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Alan Rashkovsky had to slog through two multiple-choice science exams and a bowl of whipped cream to find out he had been selected as a finalist in the Olympiyeda International Science Talent Competition.

The whipped cream, his sister's idea, hid a plastic-encased message: "Alan, you made it!"

Out of hundreds who wrote the initial exam, Andrea Heckler, 16, of Montreal, and Rashkovsky, 15, of Thornhill, are the only Canadians among some two dozen Diaspora teens (mostly North American, with three from England) to have won a three-week trip to Israel, including a 10-day summer science camp at the Technion — Israel Institute of Technology.

About half a dozen summer participants, of whom there are an equal number of Israeli and Diaspora teens, will be chosen to enter the finals, to be broadcast on Israeli television.

Olympiyeda, also known as

Andrea Heckler

Alan Rashkovsky

Olympics of the Mind, is sponsored by Haifa's Israel National Museum of Science for 9th and 10th-grade students. The name of the contest combines the idea of the Olympics with the Hebrew word for knowledge.

Instituted in the late 1980s, the competition was originally designed for Israeli students, in conjunction with the Weizmann Institute of Science and Israel's ministry of education.

Three years ago, the New York-based American Friends of the Israel National Museum of Science began to expand the program a few cities at a time, to make it an international event.

"We believe that the Olympiyeda can serve as an important vehicle, not only for discovering and nurturing creative young scientists, but also for helping American Jewish young people establish contact with Israel, and strengthen their Jewish identity," said Judith Rubin Golub, executive director of the American Friends group.

The first exam in the competition series tests general scientific knowledge; the second (written locally, like the first) is based on a university-level information package on a specific subject. This year's topic, communication, included subcategories such as electronics, frequencies and amplitudes.

Rashkovsky, an alumnus of Bialik Hebrew Day School, is entering Grade 11 at University of Toronto Schools, a private school for gifted students. He expects the trip will be "a great learning experience. I'll meet a lot of interesting people from everywhere, but most important, I'll be learning."

Such enthusiasm doesn't mean he welcomes homework with cries of delight, he explained — he also enjoys extracurricular activities such as sports and music — but "I think I really do enjoy a challenge."

As a little boy, Rashkovsky used to like to take things apart. Now he prefers to fix them. For a science project he spent 10 weekends building a steam-powered car with a friend. He has also participated in a gold medal-winning school team at a city-wide science competition and has parlayed a computer hobby into a small consulting enterprise.

"One of my dreams is to make an easy computer," he said. "Before pen and paper become obsolete, computers have to be as easy, and as quick and easy to learn."

Although he's keeping his career options open, Rashkovsky would like to go to Massachusetts Institute of Technology and "work on nifty space things."

Heckler, entering Grade 11 at The Study, a private girls' school, "for sure" wants a career in science, perhaps medicine.

Since she entered The Study after completing Grade 6 at Solomon Schechter Academy, Heckler has worked on ambitious science fair projects, earning annual participation in the Montreal Regional Science Fair.

This year's effort, done with a partner, concerned bacterial bioluminescence. An earlier project (Grade 8) concerned the effect of acid rain on building materials.

Science itself is what motivates her to work so hard, she said. "It's one of my favorite subjects."

Although, like Rashkovsky, she has a heavy load of schoolwork, she likes to be busy. A skier and swimmer, Heckler also plays clarinet and was on her school's track and volleyball teams. "And I talk on the phone a lot."

While she didn't find the Olympiyeda qualifying exams too difficult, she didn't actually expect to make the cut, she said.

"I thought if I made it to Israel, it would be an amazing experience. I'm so excited."

Hatred will destroy

In less than a week we observe Tisha b'Av, a day set aside by history and by fate for introspection and remembrance. On this day in every generation since the fall of the Temples in Jerusalem, we have turned our minds and focused our collective memory on the fragile nature of human existence generally and on the determined perseverance of Jewish existence specifically.

"Weep through the night, that your tears be without comfort as they fall on your cheek." These are words from the first of the kinot, the special lamentations. We recite them on Tisha b'Av. But with a terribly sad irony, they have even more meaning this year after the bombings last week in Machane Yehuda.

Once again, in a sudden deadly inferno, human lives were destroyed, blown to bits by the craven hatred of the holy warriors of Islamic fanaticism. This time, 13 people were killed; more than 150 were injured.

What words are there left to say more insightful, more comforting about this latest carnage that have not been said before? How many will die next time? For there will surely be a next time as long as hatred rules in the hearts of the Palestinian extremists.

Israel can take steps and already has taken steps to try to protect its citizens better. Indeed, as of this writing, in the 48 hours since the bombings, Israeli security forces have arrested more than 50 Palestinians and were "poised" to re-enter the Palestinian-controlled areas if necessary, to track down the haters and murderers intent on destroying Jewish lives.

But Israel is powerless to abate and ultimately turn aside the hatred. Only the Palestinians themselves, and their leaders in particular, can do that. Yasser Arafat must do that. And though it is a task too great for him to complete, it is a task too important for him not to begin. It is a two-stepped process. He must root out the murderers. Then he must publicly, forcefully, plainly, in Arabic and to the entire Arabic world, renounce hatred and all its evil manifestations: namely murder and violence.

Since the signing of the Declaration of Principles between Israel and the PLO on Sept. 13, 1993, 231 civilians and soldiers have been killed in 73 different terrorist attacks in Israel.

Given these figures, even the most supportive of the Oslo peace process in Israel is losing confidence in its future and is justified in doubting the bona fides and the capability of the PLO leadership in trying to eliminate terrorism.

As we have pointed out on a number of occasions, without the confidence of the majority of Israelis, there will be no peace treaty between Palestinians and Israelis. Without a treaty there will be no independent Palestinian state, or self-ruling entity of any kind. Thus, with the attack in Machane Yehuda, self-rule of whatever sovereign form is further away than ever from the Palestinians.

But then, this was one of the murderers' aims: to murder peace as well as Jews.

Hatred destroys. That is, after all, its sole method and its sole purpose. Knowing nothing other than destruction, it ultimately turns on itself too. Yasser Arafat probably understands this even though he does not yet convincingly show any public signs that he does.

But eventually he will. For not only will the hatred of the fanatic destroy him, it will also destroy the dreams and the goals of his entire people.

"Weep through the night, that your tears be without comfort as they fall on your cheek."

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

PA has responsibility on violence

The actions of one troubled and misguided woman in defaming the Prophet Mohammed was understandably upsetting to all followers of Islam. Israel's political and religious leaders issued an unqualified apology for her actions and she has been charged for her racist remarks and will be brought to justice and punished according to law. No matter how abhorrent her conduct, there is absolutely no justification for the rioting in the West Bank nor the burning of Israeli and U.S. flags in Arab countries.

It surely must be understandable that, if such a singular incident provokes violence of such dimension, then Israelis will be fearful of any land settlements, because then the rioting and the uprisings will be righ in their backyards. Surely it is necessary for the Palestinians to establish that they are trustworthy neighbors who can understand that the Israeli government is helpless is preventing irresponsible incidents before they happen. The Palestinian Authority must ensure that its population is law abiding instead of aiding and abetting rock-throwing street gangs.

Don't do me any favors

Re: "Jewish Groups urge Race Relations Policies," (CJN, July 10).

Once again Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith are dabbling naively and self-righteously in the witches brew of "multicultural" and "anti-racism" politics.

They are, in effect, suggesting to the general public that they are the definitive voice of the entire spectrum of Jewish opinion, in a battle whose principle beneficiaries are not exactly friends of the Jewish people.

Unexamined lip service to "motherhood and virtue" causes like "multiculturism" and "anti-racism" are not necessarily synonymous with Jewish interests or Jewish dignity. Most members of "vulnerable" and "visible" special interest groups follow a "Tut mir nisht kein toivas" (Don't do me any favors) attitude toward their well meaning Jewish knights in shining armor. They are both realistic and practical.

My father and I are looking for our relatives, who live in Canada. My grandfather, Ilia Ruvimovich Garber, was born in 1893 and lived until 1914 in Belovezskaya Puscha (now Belarus). He was a soldier in World War I at the Turkish front and then, after 1917, lived in Rostov-on-Don. He was killed in 1941 fighting against the Nazis.

His two brothers (who may have been textile workers) left Russia, probably from the Ukraine region, in around 1905 to 1910 and lived in Canada beforeWorld War II. They corresponded with my grandfather until 1940.

Can anyone help us find our relatives? I can be reached directly by e-mail: [garber@garber.saratov.su] or through the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University e-mail: [michaelb@yorku.ca]; phone: 416-736-5823).

Strict rules deny justice to victims

In response to your July 3 article concerning additional compensation to Holocaust victims, I would like to direct the readers' attention to a reality which is reflected in the refusal of my own claim, as well as those of many others, which do not conform exactly to conditions set forward by the Claims Conference in line with the German government. For example, a very short time missing for the stipulated period to have been spent in a ghetto or camp, or in my case, having been hidden, was, according to decision-makers, not enough suffering, as if being a Jewish child in Hitler's Germany in itself was not "unmentshlich" (inhuman) enough to merit assistance now from the German government for someone who lives on a limited income (another condition for eligibility).

Should the inheritors of the Third Reich not feel privileged to be able to help those few people still alive to have a richer, more dignified old age? At this point we know and they know that many of their fellow Germans who killed and tortured our families now receive splendid pensions from that same government, even those who found refuge in Canada.

Are there secret codes in the Bible?

By B. BARRY LEVY

Throughout the millennia, people have always delighted in seeking out and claiming to find secret mesages encrypted within the text of the Bible. Efforts at decoding the Bible have been the subject of several recent books, including M. Drosnin, The Bible Code (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1997), and R. M. Haralick and M. Glazerson, The Torah Codes and Israel Today (Jerusalem: Lev Eliyahu, 1997).

The CJN asked Barry Levy, Professor of Jewish Studies at McGill University and Dean of McGill's Faculty of Religious Studies, to comment on the phenomenon.

In this issue we publish Part I of Levy's commentary. Next week we will publish the conclusion.

Part I

For thousands of years, readers have found the contents of the Torah meaningful. For much of that time, too, numerous halachic authorities have admitted that the text of the Torah contains minor spelling flaws. Since the Torah makes sense as it is, it should be read, understood and applied (if one so chooses) in as straightforward a manner as possible. We may disagree about how to do this — or whether we should do it at all — but the student of any text must avoid certain pitfalls, one of which would be regrouping the text into new words in order to scour it for highly anachronistic references.

Yet, this very procedure is being carried out by computer-aided mathematicians who assume the Bible text is letter-perfect and able to provide limitless information on both past and future events. Such thinking is not unprecedented and may be entertaining, even inspiring, but it cannot be sustained in the face of reasoned challenges. Why, then, has this decoding craze captured the attention and imagination of so many unsuspecting Jews and Christians?

Every generation of readers has left its own unique imprint on the Bible; some have created highly innovative interpretative strategies. These often resulted from applying their era's best thinking to the Bible and producing what, at the time, seemed like the most advanced understanding possible. Thus, some writers combined the Bible with essential elements of Greek thought; others added from the sciences of their ages; still others, from the humanities.

Each generation has helped clarify the Bible, but anyone schooled in the history of its interpretation can easily identify the intellectual context in which almost any extensive sample of interpretation was produced. Like art, interpretation reflects clearly and distinctly the cultures and contexts of individual interpreters, the schools they represent and the creative worlds in which they worked, including their cutting-edge ideas, interpretative tools, fads and erroneous beliefs.

Some interpretative efforts are based on permanently valued modes of analysis, but even they sometimes lead to inappropriate results. Academic preferences change quickly. While the rabbinic world is less capricious, there, too, one is confronted by an interesting dilemma. What should be done with interpretations produced by millennia of learned, pious thinkers, works that are no longer popular or even defensible? Some moderns would consign them to the bibliographic scrap heap and indeed, this is the fate of much contemporary scholarship. But a similar reaction cannot serve rabbinic interests.

To be sure, many rabbinic writings have little or no long-term impact, but theoretically they remain available to potential readers. And what of the erroneous ideas they and other more popular works contain? Once they have been worked into the fibre of rabbinic thought, many rabbis are reluctant to consider their rejection. Some are happy to expunge the scientific parts of pre-modern Bible commentaries because old science is bad science and its presence is somehow seen to discredit a commentary's timeless appeal. Some are also willing to censor critical-sounding notions in rabbinic works either by carefully avoiding them or by actually removing them from specific editions or translations, because critical thinking is unfashionable in much of the Orthodox community. Only marginally better is a strategy that allegorizes no-longer-acceptable notions, in order to avoid challenging or rejecting what appear as the literal intentions of authoritative writers.

A third response accepts the legitimacy of all these teachings and merely assigns them complementary positions in a poorly defined hierarchy of interpretation. This may appear respectful of the interpreters, but it actually casts aspersions on the texts they all labored to explain, because the defence of dozens of outdated or inferior interpretations does the primary text no credit and complicates any serious effort to understand it. Adding to this the belief that the Torah is divine produces an even stranger result, for the belief in God's omniscience is often taken to suggest that all these interpretations offered by centuries of pious interpreters must, of necessity, have been intended by God and consciously associated with the text.

To be sure, many rabbis argued endlessly to defend or to defeat particular interpretations and rejected outright those with which they disagreed, but this spirit of challenge, debate and resolution is often lost on latter-day students of sacred texts. Moreover, it is self-evident that texts can carry far more than one meaning, but this acknowledgement may have gone too far. At least since the 16th century, mystics have spoken of not two or seven or 70 theoretical interpretations of the Torah, as did the ancient or medieval rabbis, but 600,000, and in some cases, 2.4 million.

The radical post-modern notion that a text is only what the reader finds in it goes even further, because it legitimates limitless, ill-defined interpretations. These infinite numbers of Torah interpretations, all deemed to be of divine origin, allow anything to be said in the name of the text, and only the stout-hearted dare disagree.

Over the years, astronomy, mathematics, biology, philosophy, linguistics and physics have all had an impact on Bible study, but so have astrology, alchemy and numerology. Because the last three are based partly on science, they have found a hallowed place in some classical interpretations, where they remain and continue to influence popular thinking. It is in this context that one must consider the recent rush of books and articles devoted to decoding the Bible.

The decoding strategy is relatively simple. One omits all the spaces between the words and reconfigures the text in grids of varying sizes thereby juxtaposing letters originally found at recurring, often very extensive intervals. This creates new combinations of letters that — when read frontwards, backwards or diagonally — can be interpreted as words. Counting every nth letter from various arbitrary starting points seemingly reveals allusions to Napoleon, AIDS, Israeli and American politics, the Holocaust, and other contemporary figures and events. Christians also are decoding Hebrew Bible texts and finding references to Jesus and christological themes.

It is claimed that reconfiguring the texts this way also allows people to predict the future. "Yitzhak Rabin" was decoded together with a reference to murder, which led some bibliomancers to predict his assassination; "Benjamin Netanyahu" was decoded in close proximity to "chosen," which let them anticipate his election, despite polls to the contrary. Predictions of mass destruction were decoded for 1996, 2000, and 2006, but the uneventful passing of the first date has challenged this disclosure and forced decoders to consider that their predictions may be only possibilities, not certainties.

Decoding generates limitless letter combinations, some of which resemble words, but attributing meaning to them requires accepting many dubious assumptions. The decodings must have statistical validity and not be random coincidences. Also, one must agree that when the Torah text was formed, detailed knowledge of the future was possible, available and actually encoded in it — that some higher intelligence intended what is perceived as encoded information; that transmission of the Torah text has been so accurate that these messages are still intact; and that the decoded combinations of letters are valid representations of the people, dates and events with which they are associated.

Despite the simplicity and clarity attributed to the decoding process, making sense of the alleged messages requires no small amount of ingenuity and subjectivity. (The data on Rabin, for example, also could suggest he was a murderer.)

God is often assumed to be the encoder, which reinforces the Torah's sanctity and authority and may sound quite pious to some readers, but not to all. Predestination is an ancient idea, but far from universally accepted by traditional Jewish thinkers. It undermines the notion of free will, the belief in reward and punishment, responsibility for sin and the ability to repent. One response suggests that all decoded predictions do not happen; so sin and repentance remain real options. Another is that the decoding process and its underlying assumptions are badly flawed.

Opinions

Collapsed bridge a revealing symbol

A leading Israeli philosopher, Assa Kasher, was right in describing the five different debates in the aftermath of the "bridge disaster," the colloquial name for the horrifying collapse of the temporary bridge at the Maccabiah opening ceremonies. The first three, he said, are unfortunately silent. Little has been told about the lives of the three casualties or the scores of wounded athletes; little has been said about their grieving families; and little has been said about the bravery of the police, who responded swiftly and rescued so many from death or serious wounds.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

However, there have been two public debates in the three weeks since the tragedy. The first is the investigation into the responsibility for the faulty construction of the bridge. The committee of inquiry has completed its work and indictments are expected soon.

The second public debate is ongoing, and is both fascinating and disturbing in its insight into Israeli society. The collapse of the bridge has been seen as a metaphor for all the ills and flaws in Israeli society. As many philosophers as engineers have commented on the tragedy.

The irony of the situation is not lost on anyone. A country that can launch missiles and build a nuclear reactor is incapable of constructing a dependable bridge over the Yarkon River, the country's national sewage carrier.

The public outcry has focused on the "you can count on me" (s'moch alay) syndrome that is characteristic of its attitude to too many tasks.

In a round table discussion held several days after the bridge collapsed, several prominent social scientists commented on the origins and impact of this careless attitude. Moshe Lissak, a sociologist, attributes it to the experience of minorities that have to survive in difficult circumstances. To do so, they have to develop ways of circumventing "the system." However, says Lissack, circumventing the system also resulted in norms of shortcuts, rounding corners, disregard for the law and contempt for regulations. The line between unconventional thinking and amateurish conduct has become blurred, concluded Lissak, and this has led to more than one tragedy.

Effi Ya'ar, another sociologist, went even further. Israel, he said, is close to being anomic — a society in which norms are ignored and disregarded. In the Diaspora, and even under British rule, disobedience of the law was not immoral; in fact, it was a condition of survival. The behavior weakened the distinction between what is legal and what is illegal, and Israel's political leaders have historically done little to provide moral leadership in this regard.

Political scientist Yaron Ezrachi railed against the reluctance to assume individual responsibility. Every single person associated with the tragedy "passed the buck" when investigated, and Ezrachi bemoans the forgiving, defensive character of a society that sees it all as taking place "in the family."

Other philosophers and historians saw the origins of the "you can count on me" syndrome in Israel's military past, when the chain of command required confidentiality and total loyalty to one's superiors. In a democracy, said Menachem Brinker, there is no place for such thinking. A democracy requires transparency and accountability. The "syndrome" has become one of Israel's greatest enemies.

The fear of many is that the lessons of the Maccabiah tragedy will not be learned and that in Israel's very short memory, the episode will be quickly forgotten.

In a week in which Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu faced several no-confidence motions in the Knesset, budget cuts for 1997-98 were voted upon, and a new American strategy on the peace process was discussed, the tragic loss of life of the Maccabee athletes had to fight for attention. Good people are concerned, but they have no answers as to how they can keep the lessons of the bridge alive for the future. How does one change a mentality that is disparaging to those who "go by the book"?

There was a poignant Canadian angle in the debate. A visiting Canadian engineer told an Israeli colleague why all Canadian engineers wear an iron pinkie-ring. They are made, he said, from the remnants of a bridge that collapsed in Quebec. Every Canadian engineer received one with his or her licence. We need no better reminder, he concluded, of our responsibility for human lives.

The collapsed bridge should become a symbol of where Israel has gone wrong, and it should generate a serious self-examination. But for this to happen, more than philosophers and sociologists will have to join the debate, and take action.

Jews and the wide world of sports

The tragic deaths and injuries suffered by the Australian athletes at the recent Maccabiah Games in Israel have given the Games a visibility they might ordinarily not enjoy and prompt some reflections about the somewhat surprising 20th-century love affair between Jews and sports.

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Let's go back to the beginning. In the Bible, various characters demonstrated forms of physical prowess, courage or strength, with David and Samson among the better known. But following the Dipsersion and under the sway of rabbinic Judaism, sports, athleticism and physicality in their broadest sense became alien from normative Judaic thought and Jewish life. It is not a coincidence that when we think of styles of wrestling, we think "Greco-Roman" and not "Litvak-Galicianer."

Things began to change with Emancipation. European Jews eventually found themselves fighting in armies, experiencing sports in public schools and forming Jewish sports clubs affiliated with Zionist and other ideological or youth movements.

Jews in Europe and the Yishuv began to challenge the prevailing stereotype which labelled them as incapable of fighting, farming and athletic competition. The Maccabiah Games themselves are among other things a celebration of the "new Jews."

This reached its peak in the New World, particularly in the United States. The children of Jewish immigrants streamed into public schools and learned to embrace American culture, including sports. The local YM-YWHA's and Jewish summer camps were important settings that introduced Jewish youth to all manner of games.

The most popular Jewish sport in the prewar period was basketball. Jews became champions in basketball, as well as in more "manly" sports like boxing and wrestling. Over the decades, Jews went on to excel in all manner of sports, from baseball to swimming to tennis. (Trivia question: Name four Jews who won baseball's MVP award.)

Today, as Jews have become more upscale in their tastes, the love affair continues in a different form. Squash, tennis, biking, golf, skating, and most prominently, aerobics and fitness classes are popular with Jews. Jewish children in North American suburbs are playing many team sports as well as doing the obligatory swimming, gymnastics or judo. Perhaps only in the ranks of the very elite professional athletes has Jewish representation thinned, a result of their increasingly middle class status.

So we can now pose the question: How ought we interpret all this Jewish participation in athletics and sports? Despite the best efforts of Jewish community centres, there is a sense in which this is all one aspect of a slow process of assimilation. Traditionally ultra-Orthodox Judaism continues to look askance at what has been called bitul Torah or a waste of time better spent on Judaic study. And even among some secular Jews, the "Jewish intellectual" resonates as a more appealing image than does the "Jewish jock."

If we are concerned mainly with Jewish survival, then the ultra-Orthodox are right. No sports will serve to directly reinforce Jewish identity, learning and observance. All else equal, the celebration of sports and the "body" is more pagan than Judaic and it does detract from the elements of study and spirituality that together define the essence of Judaism.

But that is not the whole picture. For many Jews, what counts is that they play baseball or golf or tennis with other Jews. In this sense, sports can reinforce the elements of Jewish community, of Jewish peoplehood. In many ways, a daily fitness class at the Y serves the same important social and communal functions as a daily minyan.

I remember playing baseball in Hebrew in Camp Massad in the Laurentians in the 1950s and 1960s. How many Hebraists know the Massad-invented word for shortstop? That experience subconsciously taught us that Jewish identity was not incompatible with North American sports and fun. And just recently, I have seen adds urging Canadian Jewish kids to attend a two-week summer camp — in Israel!

Despite the dangers, most Jews and organized Jewish communities have figured out a way to harness the attractions of sports in a positive manner. While sports will not produce Judaic scholars, they can be used to build community — as well as healthier Jews. This is also what the Maccabiah Games do, as they represent the zenith of achievement for so many local Jewish sports clubs around the world.

The four Jewish winners of baseball's MVP award were Hank Greenberg, Al Rosen, Sandy Koufax and Rod Carew (he is a convert). The Massad-invented word for shortstop was "otzar" from the Hebrew root meaning to stop or to block.)

Organization brings people together

In a recent column, I wrote about the need for person-to-person contacts as a small but important contribution to ending the seemingly intractable Israeli-Palestinian standoff. The basic argument was, and is, that ultimately political resolutions depend on the readiness of people on both sides to stop demonizing each other and instead begin to see their opponents as human beings who are essentially like them — albeit with different lifestyles and different goals.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I have recently been made aware of such an effort to contribute to the peace process in the Mideast by small steps of personal involvement. I had never heard of Earthwards Network, based in Bainbridge Island in Washington State. The aim of this small organization is to bring the people of Israel and the Palestinian Authority closer together. Its advertising brochure lists some of its objectives: "The Mideast Citizen Diplomacy Project is based on the belief that ordinary people have tremendous power to effect change at the global level. Since its inception in 1990, we have led 11 people-to-people delegations into the heart of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"Travelling to the West Bank, Gaza and Israel, we have learned firsthand from our hosts about their lives, struggles and perceptives. Through practising the fine art of listening, we discussed many ways to directly support Israelis and Palestinians working for peace and justice. We also plan an important role at home by communicating their ideas and efforts to audiences in our home communities, thereby increasing international understanding on the critical issues.

"But perhaps our most significant accomplishment is having helped break down walls of fear, ignorance and stereotyping which keep Palestinian and Jewish people separate. Many of these friendships have had a transformational effect on both sides."

Dr. Barbara Landau, a Toronto lawyer, television personality and head of Co-operative Solutions, also emphasizes the need for interpersonal relations on every level of the human life. She points to the fact that conflict resolution has become a major player in many areas, from politics to business to marriage. If it works there, why not on the international scene?

The Earthwards Network is not involved only with Israeli-Palestinian projects. Founded in 1982, it has worked in various areas, including award-winning projects with veterans-to-veterans programs that brought together U.S. and Vietnamese veterans and has contributed to seemingly irreconcilable conflicts in Africa and other places.

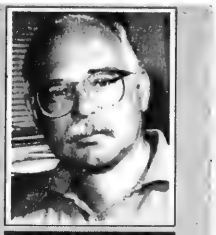
To be sure, we still need politics and politicians, but in the long run they alone cannot do the job. It is the opinion of the Earthwards — an opinion I share — that people on both sides of an emotion-filled conflict are not eternal haters, but deep down want to be neighbors and, if possible, friends.

The next trip is planned for April 1998. If you would like some information, write to Earthwards, Box 10697, Bainbridge Island, Washington 98110; Fax: 206-842-8918. In Canada, you may reach Barbara at 416-223-5111, Fax: 223-5359.

The Kirshner File

Arab journalist describes Mideast peace-making

Endless strife has convulsed the Middle East for decades now. In spite of the violence and the bloodshed, there have been covert and overt attempts to settle the Arab-Israeli dispute through peaceful means.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Several of these episodes in peace-making have dominated the headlines of late. Others are still shrouded in obscurity.

One observer who is well acquainted with the history of Middle East peace negotiations is Mohamed Heikal. He is one of the most prominent journalists in the Arab world. Heikal, a confidant of Gamal Abdel Nasser, was editor-in-chief of the Cairo daily Al-Ahram from 1957 to 1974 and, as such, possessed an insider's view of the direct and indirect contacts between Israel and its Arab adversaries.

In Secret Channels (HarperCollins, $47.95), Heikal elaborates upon these probes, beginning with the Jewish Agency's efforts at reaching an accommodation with Trans-Jordan (later Jordan) and ending with Israel's rapprochement with the PLO.

As might be expected, Heikel is not a neutral witness. He is an Arab nationalist who not only opposed Anwar al-Sadat's historic trip to Jerusalem in 1977, but is deeply skeptical of the Oslo accords, which he describes as "a bandage rather than a cure."

Be that as it may, Heikal is a fount of knowledge and information, and even if some of his judgments are tainted by partisanship, Secret Channels is a book well worth reading. Call it an interesting point of view.

The first case study Heikal deals with is the Jewish Agency's relationship with Abdullah, King Hussein's grandfather. He agreed to work with the Jewish Agency — the embryonic, pre-state government of Israel — because it served his interests.

In exchange for financial aid and a Jewish Agency promise to work for U.S. recognition of Jordan, Abdullah was prepared to turn a blind eye to the partition of Palestine, an act of treason to virtually all Arabs. According to Heikal, Abdullah's assassination in 1951 cut short his goal of signing a peace treaty with Israel.

Heikal's account of Israel's attempts to make peace with Egypt, before and after the Six Day War, forms the core of Secret Channels.

In the wake of the 1952 coup in Egypt, David Ben-Gurion, Israel's prime minister, read a statement welcoming the revolution and hoping for a new chapter in relations with Cairo. Within a few weeks, Israel began sending conciliatory messages to Egypt via a host of intermediaries ranging from Richard Crossman — a British member of parliament — to Albert Einstein, the distinguished scientist.

In a word, Nasser, the president of Egypt, was disinterested. Heikal claims that his attitude was predicated on the belief that Israel had violated United Nations-brokered ceasefire arrangements and therefore could not be trusted. And, Heikal adds, Nasser regarded the Negev, sovereign Israeli territory, as a requirement for Egypt's own security.

The contacts, though, continued through the premiership of Moshe Sharett, Ben-Gurion's successor, but were frozen by the 1956 Suez war, Heikal writes.

John F. Kennedy, the American president, initiated a new round in 1961 with a letter to Nasser. He hinted that Egypt could expect major U.S. aid if it loosened its ties with the Soviet Union and recognized Israel. Nasser's reply was not encouraging. He rebuked Washington for its role in Israel's creation and claimed that Israel was an imperialist tool of the great powers.

On the eve of his death in 1970, Heikal notes, Nasser refused an Israeli offer to return the whole of the Sinai to Egypt in return for a peace treaty. Unfortunately, Heikal does not elaborate. Just a year later, Sadat recycled Israel's proposal. But this time around, Israel refused.

During the Yom Kippur War, Heikal tells us, Sadat transmitted a message to the United States informing Israel that his goals were limited and that Egypt was ready to take part in a peace conference, provided Israel was prepared to withdraw from the territories.

As it happened, the Yom Kippur War was a turning point in Israel's troubled relations with Egypt. By 1977 Sadat was thinking in terms of a full-fledged peace treaty with Israel.

Heikal credits Nicolae Ceausescu, the Romanian leader, with convincing Sadat that Israel was sincere in its desire for peace. He informs us that Hafez al-Assad, the president of Syria, was adamantly against Sadat's precedent-shattering trip to Jerusalem. "This is treason," Heikal quotes Assad as having said. "The Arab nation will never forgive you."

Heikal's account of Sadat's meetings with Menachem Begin — Israel's prime minister — is intriguing. Sadat went to Jerusalem in the mistaken belief that Israel had accepted the idea of a full withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines.

Heikal explores at length the PLO's shifting policy toward Israel. He claims that Yasser Arafat's 1974 speech to the United Nations was "the first public hint" that a debate had begun within the PLO leadership about alternatives to armed struggle.

By the end of the 1970s, he writes, the PLO had split into two camps. "One part ... was groping in the dark for an unknown partner in Israel, while another part was trying to thwart the efforts of the first."

Heikal's reportage of Israel's unofficial links with the PLO in the 1980s is of interest. But his analysis of Israel's secret talks with the PLO in 1993 is less compelling.

Heikal, who is clearly opposed to the current peace process, believes that Israel has outwitted the Arabs.

In his view, Israel has weakened Egypt, expelled the PLO from Lebanon, divided the Arab world into rival camps and drawn Jordan into accepting its conception of peace. Israel, he thinks, had no master plan for these events. Israel exploited Arab weakness and projected military power to achieve these objectives.

As I said earlier, you may not concur with all of Heikal's assessments. But they are surely worth pondering.

Dry Bones' best in new anthology

Readers of the Jerusalem Report magazine are familiar with the humor of Ya'akov Kirschen, the fecund creator of the Dry Bones comic strip. Witty, ironic and irreverent, Dry Bones pokes wicked fun at politicians, bureaucrats, institutions and shibboleths.

Carried by 35 newspapers in North America, including The Canadian Jewish News, Dry Bones made its Israeli debut in the Jerusalem Post on Jan. 1, 1973, supposedly the first political cartoon strip in Israel.

If you appreciate Kirschen's wit, you'll surely like What a Country! (The Jewish Publication Society), a catalogue of his finest work of the past two decades. A New Yorker who settled in Israel in 1971, Kirschen is fearless, shrinking from no worthy target. The result, as you can imagine, is gratifying.

Yossi Klein Halevi, a Jerusalem Report writer, provides a lengthy and rather useful introduction.

Rabbinic Reflections

Leadership styles vary but goals are the same

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

One of the critical issues facing the Jewish (and non-Jewish) world today is finding the right people for leadership roles. In addition to having the ability to spell out a vision, plenty of patience and Solomonic diplomatic skills, one must deal with the invariable complaining of others, whose criticism is often far from constructive. Two of our greatest leaders, namely Moses and Aaron, were not spared the bickering of an often "unhappy public."

Moses' leadership is epitomized by uncompromising truth. We are taught that "Moshe emet v'Torato emet" — Moses is truth and his Torah is truth. Truth does not allow for compromises and consequently demands perfection. Moses could not tolerate a "golden calf" and reacted by smashing the tablets containing G-d's law. The Jewish people in his eyes were not fit to receive such a gift. This is what truth demands.

When the Jewish people complained that there was no water, Moses rebuked them, calling them a "rebellious people," which was the truthful description of their behavior. In despair at one point, Moses even asked that his name be removed from the Torah, as he did not want to be associated with a people whose behavior left so much to be desired.

Aaron, on the other hand, represents compromise, the striving for peace at almost any cost. He is the "ohev shalom v'rodef shalom" — lover of peace and seeker of peace. He therefore did not berate the Jewish people for wanting to make a calf — rather, he tried to offer an alternative approach.

Both types of leadership are necessary and have their rightful place. They are different approaches to a similar goal, namely to inspire people to strive to greater heights in all spheres of life so that they can reach their potential.

As inspiring as they were, however, even Moses and Aaron could not elevate the Jewish people beyond their "slave mentality" and it would take another generation (with different leaders) for the Jewish people to enter Israel.

As most of us are aware, the rabbis in the Talmud linked the destruction of the Beit Hamikdash to sinat chinam — needless hatred amongst Jews. The Talmud (Gittin 56a) places the blame for sinat chinam squarely on the shoulders of the rabbis and leaders of that generation.

In describing the paradigm case of hatred, the Talmud describes a party in which a mistakenly invited guest is tossed out despite his offering to pay for the entire event in order to prevent personal embarrassment. The leading rabbis of the day witnessed the entire event and said nothing — in essence acquiescing to this act.

When the aggrieved party incited a plot to gain revenge, the rabbis knew about it, but again did nothing. In the words of the Talmud, they were concerned with yomru — what people would say. Instead of being concerned with what was right, they were concerned with the image that would be presented. No wonder hatred was rampant.

Leadership is a challenging role. True leadership means doing what one really believes to be right even if one must act alone. By displaying this type of leadership, we can lay the foundation of a society which will be based on ahavat chinam — loving all Jews without reservation.

Rabbi Jay Kelman is the associate rabbi at Beth Jacob Anshe Drildz in Toronto.

Climbing Torah's ladder

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Judaism is about doing, and in anything Jewish that you are doing, include the kids, even when they are little. When you light Shabbat candles, the kids should be there and they should help (setting up the candles, learning the blessing). Stress to them that a candle is lit for each child, that each Jewish soul is indispensable and loved by God. Judaism can be an incredibly nurturing experience for a child.

The children should be included when you make Kiddush on Friday night. As soon as they begin to talk, they should be taught how to say it, starting with the blessing over wine.

Give your children a tzedakah box that is their responsibility, their home project. Take kids to visit people in the hospital and expose them early in life to the idea of moral obligation to others. Children feel empowered by our expectations that they have Jewish responsibilities, which they are capable of carrying out.

But all this presupposes that there is some practical Jewish activity in the parents' lives. Let us take, for example, the onset of Shabbat. It is Friday afternoon. What happens in your house? Does Mommy and/or Daddy come home earlier from work that day? Do the children see in any tangible way that Shabbat is coming? Is there Jewish music on the stereo? Are there visible preparations for this holy day? Or is it business as usual?

Perhaps part of the problem is that our generation — not just kids, but their parents too — often associates religion with boredom. Tell the children Jewish stories, play Jewish games, show Jewish videos. And let's reward them for getting involved.

Bribe the children to learn about Judaism? Well, that's the advice of our sages, who recommend that children be given encouragement and incentives to get involved in Jewish learning and practice.

In his commentary on the Mishnah, Maimonides writes the following: "A child does not understand the perfection which he can achieve by means of Torah. Of necessity, therefore, the teacher ... must bribe him to study by means of things which the child loves in a childish way. Thus the teacher may say, 'Read, and I will give you some nuts or figs; I will give you a bit of honey.' With this stimulation, the child tries to read. He does not work hard for the sake of reading itself, since he does not understand its value. He reads in order to obtain the food."

Maimonides adds that this is the way the child climbs, rung by rung, up the ladder of Torah. "As the child grows, his mind improves. What was formerly important to him loses its importance while other things become precious."

While Maimonides terms this state of affairs as "deplorable," he also cautions that is "unavoidable." Written in the 12th century, his words ring true to contemporary parents. As children grow older, they can be guided to a path that is less contingent on tangible rewards, but the most important factor in exciting young kids about Judaism is that they learn to develop positive associations. Pleasure is not a dirty word; if it's not pleasurable, you will soon find that their heads and hearts will easily gravitate to something else.

Tisha b'Av a reminder to confront responsibilities

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Tisha b'Av is approaching and once again we are reminded of tragic moments in our nation's history. Both the Jewish Temples were destroyed on this date, resulting in the exile of the Jewish people from our land. Being dispersed among the nations with no internationally recognized land to call home led to countless persecutions and further destruction on mass levels. We still live among witnesses to the most recent horror, the Holocaust.

Jews often struggle with the question of where God was during all our trials. What happened to the Protector of Israel? The pivotal moment in our relationship with God is traditionally viewed as the destruction of the Temple and all the questions can be collected into a resounding cry of "why?" Yet the Book of Eichah, written by the prophet Jeremiah and read on Tisha b'Av forces another question to the forefront.

The book begins with Jeremiah viewing the devastation of Jerusalem and uttering the haunting words "Eichah yashvah badad," often translated as "Alas — she sits in solitude!" The midrash, Talmud and classical commentaries debate the translation of the opening word, eichah. Some commentaries understand it as "why this?" — in effect echoing the question of "why."

The midrash claims eichah is an exclamation of anguish and thus the English uses "alas." The literal meaning of the word is not "why," but "how." The midrash has captured the essence of the word, for the question of "how" is in fact an anguished outcry. It is not the passive grief conveyed in the word "alas;" it is the active demand that is called out in the anger of "how." Jeremiah is not confronting the Creator demanding an explanation or justification from God. Jeremiah is directing his words to the very people to whom he directed his prophecies: his fellow Jews.

The rabbis in the Talmud state that the second Temple was destroyed because of baseless hatred. The Jewish people of the time could not find unity amongst themselves. They could only see their differences and they allowed these differences to tear the nation apart.

Jeremiah witnessed the destruction of the first Temple, but his question remains valid for the future as well. To ask "why" is to invite a theological debate with God over history and promises and covenants. To ask "how" is to confront the people and force them to acknowledge responsibility. To ask "how" is to hold a mirror to his listeners and force them to look into it.

The Jewish people today are challenged by serious internal conflicts. We question Jewish continuity, recognition of diverse interpretations. Some Jewish leaders are beginning to question financial contributions to the state of Israel because of political agendas. It is our differences that have become our focal point and we are allowing these differences to tear us apart.

Jeremiah, being a true prophet, issues his warning every year as we read his words on Tisha b'Av. May we never sit in the future and have our children turn to us and have to ask us "how."

Mourning laws and customs available on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Next Monday night, Jews observe Tisha b'Av and remember the destruction of the Temples and many other calamities that have befallen our people [http://www.virtual.co.il./city_services/holidays/3weeks/].

Tisha b'Av is unique among the holidays because on this day everyone adopts the rituals of mourning. So I felt that this would be an appropriate time to see how the Jewish Highway deals with a difficult subject: death. From the moment of death to the burial to the remembrance, Judaism provides many traditions and rituals. Understandably, this is the kind of information people rarely discuss. The Internet is a good place to find it.

For a very good overview about death in Judaism and care for the dead, see [http://user03.blue.aol.com/jewfaq/plain/death.htm]. Congregation Shaarey Zedek of Southfield, Mich., has also prepared a comprehensive Bereavement Guide [http://uscj.org/michigan/s-fielcs/bergde.html]. And Rabbi Ari Mark Cartun, of Stanford University Hillel, has compiled a Web site on Jewish Mourning Laws and Customs [http://hillel.stanford.edu/Being_Jewish/mourning.html]. In addition to reviewing some of the basic laws, he also takes a look at the Jewish perspective on cremation, embalming, autopsies, suicide and "the mitzvah of donating organs."

I was very moved by Steven Weintraub's Taharot Procedure Description [http://www.pswtech.com/~stevenw/jewish/taharot.html]. He has included a fascinating article detailing the preparations for burial by the members of a chevra kadisha. What comes through in this article is the sanctity with which the deceased is treated. For example, the writer never refers to the "body," but to the "person," since "the deceased is still a person, and all due respect should still be given the person during the procedure." A truly sobering article.

What also becomes evident is the selfless dedication of the chevra kadisha. The International Burial Society based in Jerusalem wants to encourage the use of Jewish burial customs worldwide and, in an interesting use of new technologies, to get its ancient message out [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/burial/letter.htm].

One of the most interesting places that I have visited is Liberal Judaism's Death and Dying discussion area [http://www.compclass.com/mlj/category/c13.html]. There were discussions about everything from non-Jewish burials in Jewish cemeteries to the proper yahrzeit candle glasses. One particularly heartbreaking exchange looks at how victims of parental sexual and physical abuse should observe their parents' yahrzeits [http://www.comp class.com/mlj/subject/s2438.html].

Next week, the Jewish way of remembering the dead.

Rabbi links science with messianic expectations

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Scientific discoveries can help us see that redemption is near, asserts Rabbi Shimon Silman, director of the Rabbi Yisroel Aryeh Leib Research Institute on Moshiach and the Sciences.

Rabbi Silman was speaking at a program on Science and Technology in the Messianic Era, sponsored by the International Campaign to Greet Moshiach, a group of Lubavitch supporters who believe that the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, is the Messiah.

The event was held at B'nai Torah Synagogue in North York.

Contrary to what some people believe, the rabbi said, science and Torah are not mutually exclusive.

"It says in Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers) that everything G-d created, He created for His glory – not just the earth, stars and sun, but physical and intellectual creation as well. Science, reason and logic are a creation of HaShem, to reveal His glory and honor to the world."

Anyone who sees a conflict between science and Torah, Rabbi Silman said flatly, "hasn't done enough scientific research."

Science "is preparing the world for the coming of the Messiah."

On the most basic level, he said, advances in technology "can be used to bring the knowledge of HaShem to the world," such as through satellite communication, and now, the Internet, "where you can join a shiur [class] on Gemara, or on Tanya [seminal writing on Chassidus]."

Science can also help us understand the ways of G-d: "A tiny video camera can film everything we do and replay it years later. How much more so can G-d watch what we do and remember."

Most importantly, Rabbi Silman said, science "shows the world that there is unity in nature."

Before 1840, he said, the prevailing view was that every force of nature was completely independent. Maxwell's equation, put forward in 1840, showed "the unity [between] magnetism and electric force."

Interestingly, said Rabbi Silman, 1840 was also when the philosophy of Chassidus, which is based partly on the unity of heaven and earth, was revealed.

Atomic theory, he said, showed that one atom is no different than another — that an atom of iron is the same as an atom of gold, except that the protons, neutrons and electrons making up the two are arranged differently.

This knowledge, he said, is "preparation for the absolute unity of G-d, which will be revealed in the era of the Messiah."

One of the most important signs that the messianic age has arrived, is the fulfilment of the prophesy in Isaiah: "They shall beat their swords into ploughshares."

Rabbi Silman noted that there are several examples of this: the injunction by the U.S. Pentagon that any military research must have peaceful ramifications; the development of a nuclear reactor that cannot be used to make bombs; the use of spy technology to find natural resources underground; and the development of a headset used by combat pilots during the Gulf War into a means to assist people with poor vision.

Rabbi Schneerson, who Rabbi Silman referred to only as "the Rebbe, Melech Hamashiach" (the Rebbe, the king, the Messiah), over the years made stronger and stronger statements heralding the messianic age.

His first point, was the "ingathering of the exiles," referring to the vast numbers of Jews who left Russia "peacefully and with the help and encouragement of the Russian government," rather than being forced to leave.

In every generation, Rabbi Silman said, the Shchinah, the spirit of G-d, which remained with the Jews when they were exiled from Israel, is strongest in one particular shul, and "from that shul, G-d's presence will return to Jerusalem."

That shul is 770 Eastern Parkway, Lubavitch headquarters, the rabbi said.

"The expansion of 770 is connected to the rebuilding of the Third Temple. When it is complete, the shul, along with the Rebbe, Melech Hamashiach, and the Shchinah and the Jewish people will all go to Israel together."

NCJW exhibit on tap

TORONTO — The National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW) of Canada is marking its 100th birthday this year with an archival exhibit to open Sept. 22 at the Multicultural Historical Society of Ontario, in conjunction with NCJW's biennial convention.

Among the items on display will be photographs, newsletters, newspaper articles, invitations and correspondence contributed by active NCJW sections in Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, London, Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal, and former sections including Victoria, Calgary, Lethbridge, Regina, Saskatoon, Welland, Ottawa and Quebec City.

The exhibit will remain in Toronto until Nov. 30, after which it is scheduled to travel to Vancouver and other cities.

"One hundred years of service and volunteer dedication is a milestone to celebrate and a tribute to women's initiatives and achievements," said Gita Arnold, co-chair of the archival exhibit committee. "This exhibit gives us the opportunity to portray the meaningful and diverse role women have played and continue to play in our national history.

"We are grateful to the Multicultural History Society of Ontario for their assistance and support in assembling this invaluable collection and making it accessible," said co-chair Frances Mandell.

With a focus on service, education and social action, NCJW is a Canada-wide network of volunteers committed to addressing community needs. The organization offers programs and educational opportunities to youth, seniors, families, new Canadians and the disadvantaged.

The biennial convention, being hosted by NCJW Toronto Section Sept. 20 to 23, will include discussion on child poverty and literacy in Canada, and NCJW's role in addressing these issues into the 21st century.

COMMUNITY BRINGS BRANSON BACK TO LIFE

A few weeks ago North York Branson Hospital was terminally ill. Today, thanks to an unprecedented community campaign, Branson's life has been restored although its future remains uncertain.

The dose of relief came on July 23rd when the Health Services Restructuring Commission announced Branson would not be closed but would instead operate as an ambulatory care facility.

When the Metro District Health Council recommended the closure of Branson along with 10 other Toronto area hospitals, a loud cry was heard in the city's north end. The voices of thousands of Branson area residents, mostly elderly, demanded the hospital stay open.

Almost immediately after the shocking announcement UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, together with Branson hospital, began mobilizing the community for what would become an emotional two year battle. Rallies were organized, petitions signed, telephone calls to MPPs and desperate pleas were made, not just on behalf of the threatened hospital, but on behalf of a community which saw the facility as a lifeline.

The high concentration of elderly Jews living in Branson's service area and the loss of the hospital's ethno-specific services such as kosher meals and an on-site chapel, raised the issue to the top of the community's agenda. Strong submissions were sent to the Metro District Health Council and the Health Services Restructuring Commission urging re-consideration of Branson's closure. In the end the community was heard but the final results fell short of hopes.

Although Branson will remain open as an ambulatory care facility, management of the hospital will be handed over to North York General and much uncertainty remains around Branson's emergency capabilities.

"Although we could consider this a victory," says Alan Sandler, Vice President of Community Planning and Allocations at UJA Federation, "the situation is certainly not ideal and a lot of questions remain." Sandler is still unclear about whether Branson will have the ability to stabilize heart attack and other emergency cases before sending the patients to another hospital. CJC, Ontario Region Vice-Chair Harold Brief is also concerned about whether Branson, under North York General's management, will continue to offer ethno-specific services.

"There remains a real concern among seniors about Branson's future. They're afraid of losing a unique facility where Jews, Seventh Day Adventists and others feel comfortable and receive quality care."

Branson President and CEO Jack Gallop confirms that details about the nature of the Branson/North York General relationship and many other issues such as staff placements, still need to be worked through. Nonetheless, Gallop remains confident that Branson will continue to provide a full range of services. "We have such excellent surgical facilities and expertise that should not go to waste," he says.

"Although many unanswered questions remain, we are relieved about the decision to keep our hospital open and we are tremendously grateful for everyone's support," Gallop added.

SENIORS CONCERNED

Marion Greenberg is worried the hospital that saved her life twice won't be around the next time she needs help. Greenberg, who suffered her first heart attack in 1963 and a second one last year resulting in a triple by-pass operation, says she wouldn't be alive today if it were not for Branson being so close by.

Marion Greenberg credits Branson hospital for making sure she had many more opportunities to spend time with her granddaughter Rebecca.

"Branson saved my life so the least I could do was fight to save Branson," explains Greenberg, who, along with thousands of other seniors living in the area fought to keep the hospital open after the Metro District Health Council announced its closure in 1995.

A brief prepared by UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, urged the Council to reconsider closing Branson because close to 30,000 people over age 65 living in the hospital's immediate vicinity depend heavily on emergency services.

Many seniors, like Greenberg, were mobilized by the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living's Social Action Committee and the Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens' Organizations.

Social Action Committee coordinator Sheila Zane, says "Branson is closest to our hearts and of paramount interest to all our members." Representatives from the Betel Centre, a UJA Federation funded agency, and other seniors' groups made submissions to the Metro District Health Council and the Health Services Restructuring Commission arguing the loss of Branson would be a terrible blow to the elderly.

71 year old Reta Duenische-Turner feels betrayed. In addition to concern about the hospital's future, she worries about taking two buses and crossing busy intersections for treatment at York-Finch hospital for complications arising from recent knee replacement surgery.

"Branson is ours," she stresses. "It belongs to the community."

Community Power: A Chronology

Toronto's Jewish community, with the full involvement of UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, played an integral role in pleading the case for keeping Branson's doors open. The following chronology traces some of the highlights of the* Save Branson Save Lives *campaign.

• SEPTEMBER 1995
Metro Toronto District Health Council announces hospital closure recommendations. North York Branson Hospital to transfer all services and programs to York Finch Hospital. Consideration will be given to maintaining ambulatory services.

On October 29, nearly 3,000 community members including North York Mayor Mel Lastman, MPP Monte Kwinter, Metro Councillor Norm Gardner, Defence Minister Art Eggleton and Rabbi Joseph Kelman, attended a rally at Branson protesting the proposed closure.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region and UJA Federation make a submission to Metro District Health Council arguing the closing of "this community based medical institution will have a disproportionate effect on the Jewish community." The brief also pointed out that "approximately one third of Branson's in-patients are members of the Jewish community and as many as 50% of those treated in the emergency department or at Branson's various out-patient clinics are Jews."

• NOVEMBER 1995
More than 65,000 people signed petitions which were delivered by Mel Lastman to Monte Kwinter for parliamentary reading.

• FEBRUARY 1996
Gala fundraising dinner at Beth Emeth Synagogue. More than $62,000 was raised for the Save Branson Save Lives campaign.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region and UJA Federation make a second submission to the Health Services Restructuring Commission expressing "deep distress" at the Commission's recommendation to close Branson.

• APRIL 1997
UJA Federation and CJC write to Ontario Premier Mike Harris and meet with Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick.

• MAY 1997
Hundreds attend a joint press conference and rally organized by the Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens' Organizations.

• JUNE 1997

FREILICHE MUSIC

Summer in the city with happy music can be a pure delight, as this group of revellers can attest. Last week in North York, Mel Lastman Square rang with the sounds of freiliche music. Seen in these photos are, clockwise from lower left, Marvin Rosenshein (also known as Marty Rose), who was the emcee for the evening's entertainment; a dancing Mrs. Cohen; Sharon Merten and daughter Hailey; and Ann Rosen with 4-year-old Tiffany Cohen, and 2-year-old Brittany.

Baycrest to appeal

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A decision to shut down the 32-bed rehabilitation unit in Baycrest Hospital and transfer it to West Park Hospital will be appealed to the Hospital Services Restructuring Commission.

Baycrest will argue that rehabilitation is an important part of the continuum of care for these patients and alternative options will be proposed to keep them at Baycrest.

A spokesperson for the hospital said that unlike its decisions about acute hospitals, the commission's proposals on chronic care and rehab units are not final and are subject to appeal.

The shift would not take place until March 31, 1998.

The future of the staff assigned to the unit is also in doubt.

"לגידי קורן שלום. בזמן האחרון ראינו אותך מספר פעמים בטלביזיה מדבר על ספר חדש שלך שעוסק בילדים בסיכון. למה שלא תזרוק איזו עצם גם לקוראיך הנאמנים? בתודה מרים ק"

"אני בטוח שלא שמעתם עדיין על חסן ג'מיל. הוא היה בן חמש שנים כשראיתי אותו בפעם האחרונה במחלקתנו. הוא סובל ממום בלב מלידה. סמוך ללידתו הועבר לראשונה לתל השומר ונותח בליבו. מאז נותח עוד פעם ואושפז פעמים רבות. לא הייתי מטריח אתכם בסיפורו של חסן ג'מיל, אלמלא היה גר באל-עריש, ומאז הסכם השלום והחזרת עירו למולדת - חדל לבוא! זאת אומרת, חדלו להביא אותו. זה מוזר לחשוב על בעיות כאלה קטנוניות כשפורץ שלום כזה גדול. ובכל זאת, עובדה, יש הרבה אימהות באל-עריש ובסנטה קטרינה ובכל מיני פינות אחרות בסיני שהיו מוכנות שהשלום יידחה באיזה חצי דור - או, לפחות, עד שילדיהן החולים יגדלו. טוב, בטח שאנחנו לא המצאנו את הרפואה. אבל הסיכוי שחסן ג'מיל יגיע לקהיר אחת לשבועיים למעקב רפואי שואף לאפס. אני יודע שהרבה גבות מתרוממות לשמע טיעוני הקלושים, בסגנון "זאת בכלל לא הבעיה שלנו - זב"ם"! כן, אבל אם הייתם רואים חמש שנים ברציפות את חסן ג'מיל,ילד ביישן עם עיניים אפורות בנעלי בית מפלסטיק, הייתם מדברים אחרת.לפני כמה שנים, במילואים, טסתי ל א-טור להביא יולדת שהתקשתה בלידתה. שם בין הדיונות עמדו בידואים, משתוממים על היהודים המוזרים, שמנסים לשנות את המהלך הטבעי של הלידה. הרי כבר אלפי שנים נולדים ילדים בדיונות. את אלה שמתים קוברים בחול.לעתים גם האם נפטרת, ועושים בור יותר גדול. ועכשיו,טראח! באים היהודים ומפנים את הבדואיות לאילת, לניתוח קיסרי על פי מיטב הטכניקות של הדור. עכשיו החזירו את ההיסטוריה. חסן ג'מיל ורבים מחבריו יעברו את מה שמקנים ברפואה "המהלך הטבעי של מחלתם". קורבנם הקטן לשלום.

Reconstructionist Judaism growing by leaps and bounds

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Reconstructionism in the United States and Canada is growing by leaps and bounds – 15 to 20 percent a year. And that's a sign that more and more North American Jews are looking for spiritual and intellectual paths to Jewish identification, a leading figure in the movement said during a recent visit to Montreal.

In an interview with The CJN, Dr. David Teutsch, president of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in Philadelphia, said the movement's biggest challenge these days has been to keep up with the demand.

"We have to be able to train rabbis in sufficient numbers to keep up with the movement," Teutsch said.

"We need them for congregations, Hillels, college campuses, chaplaincy departments, communal organizations and Jewish educational centres."

Teutsch attributed the growth in his movement's popularity to several factors. But one of the most important is Reconstructionism's ability to satisfy the spiritual and intellectual longings of North American Jews within the movement's "democratic" structure.

He noted that while Reconstructionism does not encourage intermarriage, congregations welcome intermarrieds and converts – in fact, anyone who considers him or herself Jewish and who "wants to be part of the Jewish community."

Chavurah group

In Canada, the increase in reconstructionist activity has been harder to measure because Jews tend to be attracted to more conventional streams.

But despite having only two bona fide congregations – in Toronto and Montreal – an informal Ottawa chavurah group has been seeing a steady growth, Montreal's Reconstructionist Synagogue Rabbi Ron Aigen noted.

Teutsch said that more and more, Reconstructionism is drawing adult Jews seeking the movement's "inclusive" approach.

While the Jews who come originate from all branches of Judaism, from Orthodox to secular, Teutsch discounted the notion that Reconstruction's rise in popularity has been the result of attracting assimilated Jews or drawing away disenchanted Jews from other streams.

He thinks, rather, it has been the movement's increased focus on the study of Jewish texts, on "spirituality" and the arts, without sacrificing its democratic and intellectual underpinnings.

"We are talking about wonderful values not bound by halachic decisions," Teutsch said.

He believes the increased interest in "spirituality" within Reconstructionism reflects a shift from 30 to 50 years ago.

He said previous generations of reconstructionist Jews who rejected "theistic" approaches have been succeeded by generations with a more "integrated" outlook.

"Now those with modest beliefs want paths into Jewish living," he said.

In Philadelphia, Teutsch noted, the increased interest in Reconstructionism has taken the form of a centre for Jewish ethics at the college and an expansion into the arts.

The college even boasts a vocal group called the Api Chorus.

Teutsch said that while Reconstructionism is still rejected by more fundamentalist elements within Judaism, the movement has friends within mainstream Orthodoxy who possess a "pan-communal" philosophy.

Still, Reconstructionism has been gun shy about being perceived as too "liberal."

While accepting intermarried couples, the movement discourages intermarriage and most rabbis will not perform mixed couple marriage ceremonies (although some rabbis agree to bear witness at civil marriage ceremonies).

The movement has also made welcoming overtures towards the gay Jewish community in terms of being "inclusive," but leaves it up to individual congregational rabbis as to whether to perform "commitment" ceremonies.

"We are more prone to providing guidelines than rules," Teutsch said.

Rabbi Aigen noted that in Montreal, the Reconstructionist Synagogue (Dorshei Emet) is planning an event next Sukkot in support of the Jewish AIDS hospice being organized by the National Council of Jewish Women.

Sephardi engineer played key role in PEI bridge

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Confederation Bridge, which has linked New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island since May 31, is an imposing architectural structure that took 44 months and about $1 billion to build.

The principal shareholder of the Strait Crossing Development Inc. (SCDI), the consortium that headed the project, is JANIN, the Montreal-based subsidiary of GTMI (Canada), a French multinational that holds 49.9 percent of the shares. The other two firms involved in the project, Ballast Nedam Canada Limited and Strait Crossing Inc., hold 35.1 and 15 percent respectively of the shares.

To build the 12.9-kilometre bridge, concrete components of up to 7,500 tonnes were prefabricated on land and then assembled and installed in the Northumberland Strait. This was accomplished by using the Svanen system, an innovation of the project.

"Thanks to the Svanen system, the heavy elements of the bridge were placed in the sea with centimetre precision," said deputy project director, Gabriel Soudry, vice-president GTMI (Canada) Inc. and JANIN. "Unique of its kind, the Svanen is a 102-metre high (equivalent to a 30-storey building) floating crane with a...capacity of 8,200 tonnes."

As deputy project director, Soudry, who is part of the Montreal Jewish community, answered only to the project director and was responsible for all aspects of the bridge, including operations, engineering and construction, project controls and administrative support.

"Confederation Bridge is the first example of a public-private concession partnership of the BOT (build, operate and transfer) type in Canada," Soudry said. "It is the product of an agreement between the government of Canada and the SCDI consortium. The agreement provides for the financing, design, construction and operation of the bridge for 35 years.

"By its significant participation in the various management phases of the project, in the implementation of its operation and in the legal and financial aspects, the Montreal office of JANIN played a primary role in the realization of this huge undertaking."

According to the Sephardi engineer, who graduated from the Technion Institute in Haifa, the highly original financial plan created within the public-private partnership will benefit all taxpayers and users of the bridge. For the duration of the contract, from May 1997 to the year 2032, the Canadian government will give the consortium an indexed annual payment of $41,900,000, in exchange for financial guarantees by the parent companies of GTMI (Canada) Inc. and Ballast Nedam Canada.

The other source of financing will come from the tolls paid by users of the bridge.

"At the end of the contract, the bridge will be given back to the government of Canada for a symbolic price of $1 and will again become public property," Soudry said.

The builders of Confederation Bridge had to come to terms with climactic and ecological conditions.

Despite the 20 months of winter when it was impossible to work on the frozen sea, the schedule of construction was strictly observed and the bridge was built in the record time of 3½ years. At the peak times, 2,500 people worked full time on the construction site.

It was also necessary to preserve the environmental balance of the Northumberland Strait, which forms an ecosystem whose survival depends to a great extent on the flow of the ice that covers it five months a year. The bridge had to be designed so that it would not hinder that flow, in order not to disturb the lobster population that is one of the principal sources of revenue of the fishing industry of the area.

The consortium took the steps necessary to protect the environments of the region on land and sea, particularly the wetlands and the bird sanctuaries.

Israel Bonds to honor Helen 'Dolly' Cohen for volunteer work

By MOURA WOLPERT

HAMILTON — In 1988, the members of the Adas Israel Men's Club named Dolly Cohen "Man of the Year" for her help and efforts on their behalf. Now, the community's women will also honor Cohen for her many years of dedicated volunteer service at the annual State of Israel Bonds Women's Division luncheon Sept. 10 at Adas Israel Synagogue.

At the luncheon, which will be the Hamilton community's first major fundraiser of the year, the guest speaker will be former Miss America, Bess Myerson.

Cohen, whose name is Helen, has been called Dolly since childhood. She was born and raised in Toronto and started volunteering as a teenager. During World War II, she was recognized for her work with the Women's Volunteer Services. She moved to Hamilton 41 years ago with her husband Ralph and soon became actively involved in the community. She was instrumental in the formation of Aviva chapter of B'nai Brith Women.

Cohen has been an active volunteer with the federation, the Hamilton Hebrew Academy, Jewish National Fund and Bonds. She is also a member of Hadassah-WIZO, ORT and Emunah Women, and has served as co-chair of UJA Women's Division and president of Adas Israel sisterhood.

Cohen has held full-time jobs as secretary with the former Council of Jewish Organizations (now the Jewish Federation of Hamilton-Wentworth & Area) and as secretary/ bookkeeper of Adas Israel Synagogue. She is still working part time in the UJA-Jewish Federation office.

Survivor pushing for Romanian pogrom memorial

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Holocaust survivor from Romania has launched an effort to have a memorial built at Yasi, the site of one of that country's worst pogroms.

Montreal resident Issie Veisfeld recently formed an association called Romanian-Jewish Survivors of the Holocaust, in order to lobby Romanian President Émil Constantinescu through the Romanian embassy in Ottawa.

Veisfeld said he is doing this because Romania's democratic government under Constantinescu has shown a new awareness of Romanian Jewish suffering during the Holocaust, and of the country's complicity in Nazi crimes under the fascist government of Ion Antonescu.

"What this president [Constantinescu] did, no other Romanian president has done before," Veisfeld said. "[So] this is the first opportunity in 56 years" to have a memorial put in place, he said.

The lobbying effort has included soliciting names for a petition brought recently to the embassy and seeking to have Romania's collaboration in the Holocaust incorporated into that country's school textbooks.

Veisfeld has also been soliciting the collaboration of such highly-placed Jewish community figures as Irving Abella and Irwin Cotler.

Another member of Veisfeld's group is a well-known local lawyer of Romanian descent, Dida Berku. Support for the campaign is also being sought from personalities ranging from Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Edgar Bronfman to Pope Jean-Paul II.

The Jews of "Greater" Romania during World War II, which included the areas of Bucovina and Besarabia, numbered 600,000 in1941, but only half that at the end of the war.

On June 29, 1941, 11,200 of Yasi's 17,000 Jews were massacred by local police (members of the Iron Guard) and by Germans, in what Veisfeld said has become known as "Romania's Kristallnacht."

Thousands of Jews were either shot or herded into closed cattle cars, where they were kept in a blistering heat for two days. Then the cattle cars were transported to a nearby town and the bodies dumped into mass graves.

"What we want is for Romania to assume responsibility for the massacre" by setting up the memorial, Veisfeld said.

It should be located at the site where the bodies were dumped into the mass graves, he said.

Veisfeld estimated that 5,000 to 6,000 Jews still live in Romania.

His initiative came shortly after a community commemoration for local Romanian Holocaust survivors was held at the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

Veisfeld said his group could eventually link up with an Israeli-based Romanian survivor group, which is seeking financial restitution from the Romanian government for confiscated property and other damages. But he added that his only priority right now is to have the memorial established.

For more information, contact Veisfeld at (514) 676-0687.

Lubavitch in Winnipeg to launch summer yeshivah program

By MYRON LOVE
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The Lubavitch movement is starting its first summer yeshivah program in this community on Aug. 6

Similar programs have been set up in a number of other cities, notes Rabbi Avraham Altein, the Lubavitch rabbi in Winnipeg, but they have been more limited.

The Winnipeg program, which will run throughout August, is being partly funded by the 18-month-old Mayer Zev Yeshiva Fund. The teachers are a group of 10 young men from the Lubavitch yeshivah in Detroit, who will be teaching and continuing their studies at the same time.

The yeshivah program is open to anyone who wants to learn in a yeshivah atmosphere, says Rabbi Altein. It will use one-to-one or one-to-two active learning, poring over texts and discussing questions that arise.

He reports that two of the students arrived in the city a little earlier and began phoning people who might be interested in participating in the program.

"A number of people said they were interested in coming," he says. Torah classes will be held in the mornings at Chabad House in north Winnipeg and afternoons and evenings at the new Ohel Menachem Torah Centre that was just dedicated in south Winnipeg on the 3rd of Tammuz, the yahrzeit of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson.

"We hope to run this yeshivah program in the summers on a regular basis if this works out," says Rabbi Altein. "We are still looking for other sponsors."

Parents of missing soldiers still wait for their return

By JANINE MULLER
Special to The CJN

Guest Voices

We've forgotten about them. Fifteen years have passed since three Israeli soldiers were captured in the battle of Sultan Ya'qub in northeastern Lebanon and the names Zachary Baumel, Yehuda Katz, and Tzvi Feldman have all but vanished from the collective national memory.

How could Israel, usually so steadfast in its concern for each of its soldiers, have practically abandoned three of its sons?

The question becomes even more perplexing when we consider the case of Israel's most famous missing soldier, pilot Ron Arad, captured by Amal, a Lebanese Shiite organization, in October 1986. Arad's name has never disappeared from the national agenda. In fact, on May 20, the Knesset commemorated Ron's 39th birthday.

But the mishandling of the search for the missing soldiers by the IDF and the Israeli government has rendered the Sultan Ya'qub affair unique in IDF history. It has also produced a double tragedy for the families of Baumel, Katz and Feldman, who must bear the daily uncertainty about their sons' fate.

On June 11, 1982, six Israeli soldiers went missing after a tank battle between the IDF and Syrian forces in Syrian-controlled Lebanon. Later, three men were returned, but the Syrians denied knowing the whereabouts of the others. On that day, Western journalists and Syrian radio reported that three Israeli soldiers had been paraded through Damascus in a "victory march." Under the 1949 Geneva Convention (Section 2, Articles 11 and 12), Syria is responsible for the fate of these men.

Over the years, there has been a steady flow of information from diplomats, intelligence sources and various groups, including Amnesty International, indicating that at least two out of three of the soldiers are alive. The familes of these soldiers have travelled around the world, meeting with diplomats and politicians on all sides, seeking information about their sons.

Successive Israeli governments and the IDF have desperately tried to locate the missing men but have never succeeded in providing conclusive evidence of the soldiers' fate.

In a 1994 Jerusalem Post article, Steve Rodan documented the extent to which the search for the MiAs was plagued from the very beginning by "poor intelligence gathering, interservice rivalries within the IDF... inadequate civilian supervision and unclear guidelines of when a soldier is to be regarded as dead."

The issue of the MiAs has become even more complicated since the government of Israel entered into peace negotiations with the Palestinians in 1994. Initially, the start of negotiations involving Israel, the United States, Syria and the PLO brought new hope to the families of the prisoners that the mystery of their missing sons would be resolved at last. The government knew for certain that for their first year of captivity, the MiAs from Sultan Ya'qub were held by a faction of the PLO and that Yasser Arafat had information concerning the soldiers.

In December 1993, after excessive pressure, Arafat provided Israel with half of Zachary Baumel's dog tag. He promised to bring more information within two weeks and reiterated that promise with the signing of the Cairo Accord on May 4, 1994, and in a signed letter to Yitzhak Rabin on that same day. Four years have passed, and Arafat has remained silent on the issue of the MiAs. He has not, however, hesitated to demand the freeing of Palestinian prisoners, even threatening to halt the peace process if Israel refuses to comply with his demands.

But he needn't have worried. Both the Labor and Likud governments have released hundreds of Palestinian prisoners, without making these releases conditional on the return of our soldiers.

A 1996 Gallup poll, commissioned by the International Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers, indicated that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu would have the support of 75 percent of Israelis if he demanded that further prisoner releases be conditional on Arafat's compliance on the MiA issue, even if it slows down the peace process. But the current government seems afraid to rock the boat and apparently shares the conviction of the previous Labor government that the issue of the MiAs must not be allowed to interfere with the "peace" process.

How ironic that Baumel, Katz and Feldman have come to be viewed as "obstacles" on the road to peace. It was precisely to secure a measure of peace for the people of the Galilee that they unhesitatingly marched to the fields of battle 15 years ago. And their parents, some of them old and ailing, are still waiting for their sons to come home.

Bloodshed in Machane Yehuda

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A week that began with promise ended in bloodshed.

The twin suicide bombs that shook Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda last Wednesday not only struck at the heart of the nation's capital but also destroyed any immediate hope of reviving the moribund peace process.

The colorful open-air market, with its maze of stalls filled with fresh produce and noisy vendors, brings tens of thousands of Jerusalemites each day to buy their food. It also attracts many tourists.

The blasts killed at least 13 people, including the two terrorists, who reportedly carried suitcases containing explosives into the heart of the crowded market.

Dressed in black jackets and ties, the two apparently stationed themselves several dozen yards away from each other and, according to an initial inquiry, set off their explosives one after the other.

At least 150 people, including several Arab workers, were injured.

After the bombings, ambulances had to contend with heavy traffic to reach the injured and dead, several of whom were in grave or serious condition. The market skirts Jaffa Road, the busiest street in the capital. Rescue crews had to make their way through thousands of people, many of whom appeared to be in shock.

At the scene, police and soldiers assisted the ambulance crews, who searched through the wreckage for casualties.

An hour later, when the last victims had been rushed to area hospitals, security personnel emptied trash cans in search of other, unexploded bombs.

At the same time, gloved Orthodox men and army medics searched the market for body parts which must all be buried, in accordance with Jewish law.

Standing just outside their shops or behind police barricades, those who escaped injury said they were grateful to be alive.

Last week's attack came on the eve of a planned trip by Dennis Ross, U.S. special Middle East coordinator.

Ross' mission, intended to jump-start the moribund peace process, was postponed "for an appropriate period of mourning," President Bill Clinton announced at the White House after the explosions.

The terrorist attack is the first to strike the centre of Israel in over four months. Two Islamic fundamentalist groups, Hamas and Islamic Jihad, claimed responsibility for the attack.

On March 21, a suicide bomber struck a Tel Aviv cafe, killing three Israelis. Hamas was held responsible for that attack.

The March strike, along with the building of a Jewish housing project in southeastern Jerusalem, led to a virtual freeze in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. After months of inaction, however, there was a short burst of diplomatic activity in the region, including the first high-level meetings between Israelis and Palestinians in months.

Unlike his other recent trips that have proved unsuccessful, Ross was expected to arrive this time armed with a detailed American proposal designed to jump-start the stalled negotiations. The proposal reportedly included a suspension of new construction by Israel in disputed areas and closer security cooperation between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. But the focus on negotiations quickly dissipated as the collective mourning began last week.

Israeli officials said after last Wednesday's attack that no talks can occur until Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat takes concrete action to wipe out the terrorist infrastructure in the autonomous region.

In Washington, Clinton condemned the killings in a special news conference called immediately after the attack. "We must not let the enemies of peace prevail," he said.

Outrage and revulsion at the terror attacks were also felt in Canada, where Jewish groups unanimously condemned the violence and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien expressed "outrage and sorrow" at the bombings.

"These senseless acts of terrorism inflict untold pain and suffering on innocent people," Chrétien said in a release. "To the victims and their families, I offer my heartfelt condolences and prayers.

"Such barbaric acts must not be allowed to destroy the hopes of the people in the region for a just and lasting peace. I urge all parties to resume direct negotiations," he said.

"These attacks are further evidence of the unremitting determination of Islamic extremists to destroy the prospects of peace with Israel," said Stephen Victor, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC). "It is no coincidence that the attacks occurred only days after a resumption of peace talks between Israel and the Palestinian authority was announced."

Victor called on the Canadian government "to make clear to the Palestinian Authority that its efforts against terrorism must be all-encompassing and not merely episodic." He also said he supported "Israel's right to take all reasonable measures to protect its citizens as it pursues the difficult task of achieving peace with its Arab negotiating partners."

Israel suspends peace talks with Palestinians

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Israeli government has suspended peace talks with the Palestinians and authorized security forces to arrest suspected terrorists in the self-rule areas if the Palestinian Authority does not take action to fight terrorism.

The decisions were taken at an inner cabinet meeting hours after two suicide bombers detonated explosions in Jerusalem's crowded Machane Yehuda market. At least 15 people died, including the bombers, and more than 170 others were wounded.

The names of 10 of the victims were released: Lev Deseitnik, 60, of Jerusalem; Simha Fremd, 92, of Jerusalem; Regina Gibber, 76, of Jerusalem; Shalom Golan, 52, of Jerusalem; Valentina Kovalenko, 67, of Jerusalem; Shmuel Sami Malka, 44, of Mevasseret Zion; David Nasko, 44, of Mevasseret Zion; Muhi Adin Othman, 33, of Abu Ghosh; Leah Stern, 50, of Jerusalem; and Rahel Terniataro, 80, of Jerusalem.

While a statement issued after the cabinet meeting did not explicitly announce a halt in negotiations, it said that Israel was conditioning progress in any future talks on Palestinian action against terrorist groups.

Meanwhile, in Washington, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright announced — in a conclusion reached before the bombings — that the United States could no longer verify that the Palestinians were in compliance with the accords it signed with Israel.

Israeli security forces have arrested 28 suspected Palestinian extremist activists in the West Bank. The Palestinian Authority was also said to have rounded up about 10 suspected Hamas members in Bethlehem.

But Jibril Rajoub, who is in charge of all Palestinian security forces in the West Bank, said that there would be no mass crackdown by his forces as had been carried out after previous terror attacks.

A senior Israeli security source told reporters that the cabinet had authorized Israeli security forces to arrest suspected Islamic extremists operating out of mosques and charitable institutions operating in areas under overall Israeli security control.

The source also disclosed information underscoring Israel's charge that the Palestinian Authority was behind the violence.

The source said that Israel had solid proof linking Palestinian Police Chief Brig. Gen. Ghazi al-Jabali to planned terrorist attacks against Israelis, and that he had personally directed three Palestinian policemen from Nablus who were arrested several weeks ago when they were allegedly on their way to carry out an attack.

The source also said that the head of the Hamas military wing and planner of suicide bus bombings in Jerusalem last year, Mohammad Deif, had at various times received shelter from the Palestinian Authority.

Jabali, in a news conference in the Gaza Strip, dismissed the Israeli charges as "a joke."

Terror bombings denounced

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Zave Climan noted the attacks were "yet another example to the world of the existential security situation with which Israel must contend."

Climan, chair of Congress' national Israel affairs committee, suggested the attacks were aimed at derailing the peace process. He called on Arafat to "take every possible measure to bring an end to such violence."

B'nai Brith Canada laid much of the blame for the attacks at the feet of the Palestinian Authority (PA). They "are symptomatic of an intensification of incitement against Israelis and Jews by representatives of the PA," said Lyle Smordin, national president of B'nai Brith.

Palestine House in Toronto in its release strongly condemned the bomb attacks, calling them the cowardly attack of "a handful of diehard extremists," and urging all parties to continue with the peace process.

Arafat telephoned both Netanyahu and Israeli President Ezer Weizman to express condolences. But the prime minister rejected Arafat's words, telling him sorrow is not enough. Netanyahu said Arafat must act resolutely against the terrorist organizations.

Cars not racing to the scene of the explosions were bumping into each other as they tried to manoeuvre out of the army's way.

Soldiers, with their machine guns swinging on their backs, ran along Kiah and up Jaffa to the scene. Within seven minutes, there were hundreds of soldiers, some dressed in bulletproof vests, others from the bomb squad, all there to help. On the heels of the running soldiers, were haredi men rushing to the scene.

In the bus, everyone was upset. The mood was sullen. A grandmother sat with her 2-year-old grandson hugging him close to her. The chaos outside meant nothing to him. The quiet in the bus didn't seem to affect him. He sat on his grandmother's lap perfectly oblivious to what was going on and drifted off to sleep.

We were one bus stop away from the shuk. Everyone wanted to call their families and friends to say they were okay, but there was only one cellular phone — a little ironic since you can't seem to escape them here at any other given time. The woman with the phone attempted to make her first call, but halfway through her conversation, the battery died.

Because the bus was stopped and there was no chance of moving forward, people were shouting at the driver to open the door.

As soon as he put the radio on, everyone sat down quietly to listen to the news about what was unfolding two blocks away from us. Tears welled up. People on the bus sat with their heads in their hands.

On the street outside, there was a state of confusion and sadness.

A mother and her two daughters were walking up Jaffa Road, just outside the Clal Centre, visibly upset. The younger daughter, about 14, was shaking and crying. Clusters of people were huddled together trying to comfort each other. There were long lines at the pay phones. Many people just stopped in their footsteps and watched as the police and the army took hold of the area.

With the order from a soldier, the bus driver reversed the bus down Jaffa (which is a crazy thing to do on a normal day) to make room for it to turn right and take a detour to the bus station.

The detour through the haredi neighborhoods of north Jerusalem to the bus station took me away from the scene, but the sounds of the bombs exploding, the fear and pain in the eyes of passersby and the images of the soldiers and police racing to help are ingrained in my mind. At the bus station I got off. The sirens were still screaming from all directions of the city.

Nothing has changed

and that it's their fault, not ours; witness the bodies flung among the stalls of Machane Yehuda.

The Left's pain is no less acute than the Right's. Mourning and rage have always united us. Eventually, however, the Left will remonstrate with the Right, saying its policy is what invited the attacks, accusing the Right of making political hay out of terrorism to justify its program.

Nothing will be the same again, since a nation which buries so many victims can neither forgive nor forget; but nothing will ever change, for there are no miracles, no alternatives, and no way out.

Behold a new entry in our lexicon of tragedies: Machane Yehuda joins Dizengoff, Bus No. 18, Apropos. The list grows longer and longer, tempers grow shorter and shorter, but the situation stays the same — it's the one where we have no alternative. Where it's always deja vu.

Rage and threats? Futile. Blaming ourselves? Unhelpful. The proponents of peace will carry on along the road they began, while those who seek to destroy the peace will continue to launch terrorist attacks.

We will continue to hope and suffer; and we will carry on, fearful, since routine proves stronger than any explosion can be.

Our tears flow, our teeth are clenched tight and the stalls in Machane Yehuda reopen. As I said, we've seen it all before.

Politicians will go on promising the Jews in Israel a life of serenity, peace and security. But the struggle for all that didn't begin 50, or even 100 years ago. It started more than 3,000 years ago, and there's no end in sight.

The Week in Israel

July 28

• Israel and the Palestinians agreed to resume discussions on a safe-passage route between the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and on a Palestinian sea port. The announcement was made following talks in Jerusalem between Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy and Palestinian Authority (PA) Planning Official Nabil Sha'ath.

July 29

• An internal audit of Yasser Arafat's PLO cabinet found that $326 million (US) in public funds had been mismanaged by PA officials. A Palestinian legislative committee recommended that Arafat dismiss his entire cabinet and place senior self-rule authority officials on trial for corruption.

• In talks between Levy and Jordanian leaders, including King Hussein, Jordan asked Israel to involve the country in permanent settlement negotiations with the Palestinians.

July 30

• Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu rejected the finance minister's economic projections and delayed a scheduled cabinet discussion of the 1998 budget until mid-August. Netanyahu said the figures were too pessimistic.

July 31

• Israeli media reported that Syria's army chief of staff condemned Netanyahu's policies and warned of "dangerous consequences" in remarks published in Syria's government-controlled newspaper. He made no reference to the bombings in Machane Yehuda.

• According to a report in Jane's Defense Weekly, satellite photos indicate that Israel's nuclear weapons base is vulnerable to missile attack. Israel neither confirms nor denies it has nuclear capability.

Aug. 1

• Israeli media reported that on Thursday and through the night, security forces arrested tens of suspected terrorists in the West Bank.

Which way for Israel?

Mideast Analysis

The crisis-ridden peace process was dealt yet another grievous blow last week when 13 Israelis were killed by two Hamas suicide bombers, disguised as Orthodox Jews, in a teeming Jerusalem food market.

The blasts came on the heels of a prescient warning by Israel's chief of staff that Hamas was growing stronger and preparing for a renewed cycle of terrorist attacks, and on the eve of the resumption of talks between Israel and the Palestine Authority (PA) and the arrival of U.S. peace mediator Dennis Ross in Israel.

As a result of diplomatic efforts by the United States and Egypt to break a four-month impasse in the peace process, Israel and the PA had planned to discuss unresolved issues left over from two previous agreements: the establishment of a "safe passage" route from the West Bank to the Gaza Strip, the opening of a Palestinian airport and a harbor in Gaza, and the release of Palestinian prisoners.

Ross, for his part, had intended to present a proposal to both sides for a temporary freeze in Israel's Har Choma housing project in eastern Jerusalem, a return to full security cooperation, a commitment to stop street violence and an acceleration of bilateral negotiations.

But in the wake of the horrific bombings – the 15th major terrorist incident carried out by Islamic fundamentalists since April 1994 and the deadliest since Benjamin Netanyahu's election as prime minister – Israel suspended the talks until the PA acts against militants.

Israel also sealed off the territories, threatened to send forces into Palestinian self-rule areas and asked donor nations to suspend aid to the PA. Ross, meanwhile, postponed what would have been his second trip to Jerusalem since April.

On his last peace-making mission, Ross went back to Washington empty-handed, having failed to wring a promise from Netanyahu to halt unilateral building projects in East Jerusalem and the territories, and having been unsuccessful in persuading Arafat to share intelligence data with Israel.

In the grip of the deadlock, Israel pressed ahead with the Har Choma project. In response, the PA orchestrated a mini rebellion in the territories, as well as the murder of several Palestinian real estate agents who had sold land to Jews.

The situation went from bad to worse when a Jewish immigrant from the former Soviet Union, Tatiana Susskind, enraged Arab sensibilities by putting up posters in Hebron portraying the Muslim prophet Mohammed as a pig. The Israeli government denounced the desecration and arrested the perpetrator, but the damage was done.

In a further setback to the restoration of mutual trust, Israel accused a senior PA police commander and three of his subordinates of plotting to kill Israeli settlers on the West Bank.

The deepening gloom was relieved by a degree of PA security cooperation (the Palestinians helped Israel to crack a terrorist cell in the Hebron area responsible for the deaths of 11 Israelis) and by Netanyahu's decision to block a new housing project in the predominantly Arab Ras-Amud neighborhood in East Jerusalem.

But now, with Hamas' latest terrorist outrage, the shaky peace process once again is in dire jeopardy, and Netanyahu's policy of "peace with security" lies in tatters.

Two weeks after a poll disclosed that 41 percent of Israelis feel more personally secure today than under the previous Labor party government, Israel faces the grim prospect of still more terrorism, a phenomenon that has claimed the lives of 231 persons since the signing of the 1993 Declaration of Principles.

The newest outbreak of terrorism underlines the differences of approach between Labor and Likud. Netanyahu's position is that peace negotiations cannot proceed in the face of Palestinian terrorism. Yitzhak Rabin and his successor, Shimon Peres, believed that it was necessary "to conduct negotiations as if there is no terror and to fight terror as if there are no negotiations."

Police nab U.S. suspects

By FAYGIE LEVY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — New York City police are investigating whether the discovery of bombs and explosives in a Brooklyn, N.Y., apartment last week is connected to the twin suicide bombings that occurred at Machane Yehuda market in Jerusalem.

Three suspects, all of "Middle Eastern origin," according to New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, were arrested in an early morning raid on a building in the Park Slope neighborhood of Brooklyn.

Police discovered five pipe bombs and a Jordanian passport in the apartment. It is unclear whether the passport belongs to any of the suspects.

One of the suspects expressed support for the Jerusalem bombings, Giuliani said at a news conference.

The police launched the raid after a man speaking Arabic told them that his roommates were planning to follow up on the Jerusalem attack, according to news reports.

Professor winds up 52-year career at Mount Sinai

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's not unusual to see the names of Jewish doctors on the staff rosters of all the major hospitals.

But that was not the case when Dr. Nathan Levinne began practising medicine.

Levinne, who retired on June 30 (the same day he turned 80) after 52 years on staff at Mount Sinai Hospital (MSH), told The CJN in a recent interview that when he began his career, MSH was the only hospital where Jewish doctors could get admitting privileges.

"Anti-Semitism was rampant. Nobody [Jewish] was on staff at the University," he said, referring to the University of Toronto's (U of T) Faculty of Medicine.

"During the war, there was a shortage of doctors at Sick Kids', the worst place for anti-Semitism. Some Jewish boys were able to admit there simply because they needed bodies."

He said the situation changed dramatically in 1954 when MSH was transformed into "a modern, up-to-date, first class hospital" at 550 University Ave., the building now occupied by the Rehabilitation Institute of Toronto (formerly

He recalled that once Jewish doctors had privileges at the new hospital, opportunities opened at other hospitals and Jews were also given university appointments. He contends that the expansion of MSH hastened the acceptance of Jewish doctors by the medical establishment in the '50s.

Levinne, an emeritus professor at U of T, was the first practitioner-in-chief of the family practice unit at MSH. Family medicine became a recognized specialty some 20 years ago when the university decided to establish a special program to train family practitioners, he said. "Mount Sinai was among the first programs."

Before joining the staff at MSH, Levinne was a medical officer in the army during World War II. He said he enlisted to help Jews in Europe.

Evelyn, his wife of 56 years, was "very supportive" of this decision, he said. "She understood my position."

Levinne, who attained the rank of captain, served overseas for four years, initially in the inter-Allied Commando Unit and later with the Belgian Special Air Service. He was decorated by both the Dutch and Canadian governments.

He was in France on D-Day and was wounded in 1944 during a commando raid on Walcheren Island, just off the Dutch coast. After being hospitalized in Belgium for few days, he returned to active duty.

After the war, he set up a family practice in the Dundas and Ossington area, which he described as "a fading Jewish neighborhood" with a growing Italian community. He chose family medicine, he said, because it suited his personality. "I happen to be somebody who likes people. This was an opportunity to get to know people."

In those years, there was no health insurance: an office visit was $2; a house call was $3. Many people had trouble paying, he said, but "I never turned away anybody who made an honest living and couldn't afford to pay."

He was also on call 24 hours a day seven days a week.

As a general practitioner, obstetrics was an important part of his practice, he said. Many people turned to GPs to deliver babies because they charged $35, which was one third the cost of an obstetrician.

It was not common to share calls and practices because many doctors worried that other doctors would lure away their patients, Levinne said.

He moved his practice to the Bathurst and Lawrence area 30 years ago. He shared an office with his two sons-in-law, Simon Colla and Paul Freedman, and later with other physicians.

Levinne said he plans to study Torah now that he is no longer working. As for making the decision to retire, he said it's important to know when to stop. "I wanted to retire before I had to retire."

Blind artist's life, attitude a contrast to Van Gogh's

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Artist Ron Satok, 65, who has been blind for 18 years, now relies on memory and imagination.

Satok recently gave a lecture/performance about artist Vincent Van Gogh at Progress Place, a rehabilitation community for persons with mental illness. He demonstrated his style — flamboyance laced with sensitivity — by darting nimbly from a lectern to a huge sheet of paper affixed to the wall, where he drew a tree of life.

The demonstration contrasted Van Gogh's and Satok's response to life. Van Gogh was beset by epilepsy, lost his sanity and turned inward. Satok, battling blindness, reached out.

Satok's early strengths — athletics, a flair for acting and comedy, and architectural affinity — which served him well as a muralist, are invaluable now when he can no longer see.

Facing his world today with resilience and resourcefulness, he has developed a personal philosophy, Art Through Awareness in Action, which he defines as a creative balance involving body, mind and spirit. He also knows that to help himself, he must help others.

In 1982, he opened the Satok School of the Arts to bolster awareness of disabled people's capabilities. Classes in painting, sculpture, dance and drama help those with special needs to strive toward individual achievement.

He has branched out, lecturing, pursuing his own art, constantly innovating.

Ron Satok and the Tree of Life. [Arlene Berman photo]

Van Gogh's family were art dealers and he started as a salesman in his uncle's London gallery, but left in despair when he lost an important client.

"He didn't have a clue about the real world. When he had money [from his brother, Theo] he bought paints instead of food."

He went to Paris where he stayed with Theo, who managed a gallery there. Through him, he met several impressionists, Monet, Manet, Cezanne, Lautrec and, Satok says, "he went wild with colors!"

Later he moved to Arles in the south of France and there, says Satok, "he began to find himself, get his own style," a predecessor to expressionism.

Insisting that he would paint a picture a day and working excessively long hours, he did just that, producing his brilliant sunflowers and delicious orchards. Friends and relatives sent money for food and housing, but he knew only painting.

One weekend he drank 40 cups of coffee and ate a bit of bread. His health deteriorated.

After Theo married and had a child, Vincent, unwilling to be a continual financial drain, shot himself.

His legacy is the wonder of a lonely genius who groped but also soared.

Satok will leave a different legacy — his strong, sometimes surrealist works from the sighted years and his current, powerful linear statement. For him, the challenge always lies ahead.

UNCOVERING SPAIN'S JEWISH PAST

TRUJILLO, Spain — A statue in the Plaza Mayor or main square of this well-preserved old town of 10,000 inhabitants is dedicated to its most illustrious citizen, the conquistador Francisco Pizarro, conqueror of Peru.

The Pizarro family built a handsome mansion in the Plaza Mayor about 1560. Its facade is decorated with carved images of the conquistador, his Inca lover and other relatives.

Eighteen years before Pizarro first set sail for the New World, a group of locals took another kind of perilous journey into the unknown.

Trujillo's Jews, like their counterparts throughout the country, were obliged to convert or leave Spain, according to Queen Isabella's expulsion order of 1492.

The former Jewish quarter is just off the Plaza Mayor, centered along the graciously curved Tiendas Sreet. Jose Solis-Alvarez, a pharmacist and municipal councillor whose Farmacia is at 14 Tiendas St., is one of several residents who have uncovered evidence of the former Jewish presence in recent years.

Solis-Alvarez leads a group of foreign visitors through the basement of his tiny shop to a narrow hall where an old stone doorway is set into the white plaster wall. Uncovered during renovations, the doorway bears a row of carved Hebrew characters. A few are clearly legible but most have been dulled by time.

Working to decipher the inscription, archeologists have determined that the doorway was the entrance to a synagogue that was in use until the early 1400s, when the Inquisition made Jewish worship an offense punishable by death.

Around the corner, the elderly landlady of a commercial building along the Plaza Mayor eagerly shows off more details of what was apparently the same medieval synagogue. Maria-Theresa Perez-Zubizarreta takes the visitors into the art gallery in the large basement and points out a stone arch that has been tentatively identified as a women's entrance. A row of smaller arches set into a wall might have been the barrier separating the men's and women's sections of the synagogue.

"I was born in this house and when I was a young girl, I remember that they lowered the ceiling to make a new floor," she explains through an interpreter. "I remember seeing a sort of balcony up there." She points to some thick wooden beams that traverse the plaster ceiling.

"In the time of Isabella this building was given to the nuns and it became a convent known as the Convent of Isabel. That was commonly done with Jewish property back then."

Venturing outside, she indicates a small depression in the side of a stone doorpost where a mezuzah might once have been placed.

Such discoveries have been surfacing all over Spain in recent years. The locals, no longer content to sweep all things Jewish under the carpet, are proudly showing off fragments of the once-hidden Jewish past. Wherever one travels in Spain, one hears of a mikvah being found here, a synagogue there and imagined mezuzahs almost everywhere.

In Toledo, where two historic synagogues are already major tourist sites, the relics of a third synagogue were uncovered three years ago beneath a mechanic's garage.

In Valencia, excavators enlarging a department store basement found an old burial ground with 61 Jewish graves, all of which were subsequently moved to a cemetery in Madrid. In Segovia, Israeli archeologists recently identified another set of Jewish tombs.

"You must realize that, in Spain, part of our history was not told for many years," says Assumpcio Hosta, an official helping to restore Girona's Jewish past. "Generations have grown up without any awareness of the Jewish past. Now we're trying to fill that gap."

I recently returned from a tour of Jewish Spain hosted by the Tourist Office of Spain with the assistance of Iberia Airlines. More about this remarkable trip in the next column.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART II

A Magazine About Yiddish: Ever heard of a publication called the Pakn Treger? Recently I spotted the colorful 102-page summer issue selling for $6 on the newsstand and couldn't resist taking it home.

Named after the characters who travelled from shtetl to shtetl in Eastern Europe bringing books and news of the outside world, the Pakn Treger continues that tradition as the magazine of the National Yiddish Book Centre.

If you have an affinity for both literature and Yiddishkeit, then this magazine is for you. The current lead story is What Is Your Favorite Jewish Book? (And What Is A Jewish Book, Anyway?) The editors asked this question of 10 noted writers and scholars, including Aharon Appelfeld, Ruth R. Wisse, the centre's Aaron Lansky, and Robert Pinsky, poet laureate of the United States.

The answers ranged from the expected — Call It Sleep by Henry Roth; to the surprising — Irving Shulman's 1950s novel of teenage crime, The Amboy Dukes. Other favorites included Mendele Moykher Sforim's The Mare (Di Kliatshe), Franz Kafka's Metamorphosis, James Joyce's Ulysses and George Eliot's Daniel Deronda.

Noting that Joyce and Eliot were gentiles, the editors write: "So what makes a book Jewish? Of course, there is no single answer. How could there be? What makes this forum exciting is that there are so many possibilities — so many ways to understand Jewishness and literature and so many paths upon which 'Jewish literature' can continue into the future."

The same issue of the Pakn Treger features a portrait of Yiddish author Chava Rosenfarb and one of her stories, The Tree of Life, in both English and Yiddish. Another story remembers the late Allen Ginsberg. The magazine also features sections on learning Yiddish; it does not presume the reader is fluent.

First Novel: It's easy to see why Cynthia Ozick called Eve's Apple, the first novel by New York writer Jonathan Rosen "the work of a natural master." For one thing, Rosen writes like an angel. For another, his main characters exude a gentleness and emotional sensitivity that is rarely caught on the page.

In this deeply insightful psychological detective story, Joseph, an English teacher to Russian immigrants in New York, feels compelled to unravel the mysteries behind the anorexic and bulimic behavior of his girlfriend, Ruth. He reads her diary in secret, consults a psychiatrist on her behalf, studies every book he can find on the subject.

Rosen has produced a daring domestic tale that operates on an intense Freudian level and resonates with myth, fable and timeless human truths. (Random House.)

New Biography: Ovitz, the hot new biography by Robert Slater tells the inside story of Hollywood power broker Michael Ovitz, whom Paul Newman once described as "a cross between a barracuda and Mother Teresa."

As the leading agent and dealmaker in tinseltown, Ovitz received staggering sums for his services. Then he joined the Disney empire — a disastrous move that ended 14 months later with a severance package of $128 million.

To produce this portrait of a 1990s' mogul, Slater interviewed about 150 celebrities, including Tom Cruise, Dustin Hoffman, David Letterman and Jerry Seinfeld. (McGraw-Hill Ryerson.)

My Shelf Runneth Over: Saul Bellow's latest, The Actual, concerns a character who loves dumbly and distantly for 40 years until a chance meeting with his first love – at her husband's funeral (Viking).

New York writer Pete Hamill has produced Snow In August, which tells of the friendship between a Catholic boy and a Prague-born rabbi in a working-class neighborhood in Brooklyn. The two teach each other about baseball and ancient rabbinic lore, respectively, as they deal with a band of anti-Semitic hooligans (Little, Brown).

A winner of the National Jewish Book Award, Mazel by Rebecca Goldstein is a richly romantic novel about the lives of three generations of Jewish women. The story stretches from the shtetl to New York (Penguin).

Complete with seemingly realistic photos, W.G. Sebald's The Emigrants simulates the biographies of four persons who move around wartime Europe but ultimately fail to escape the tragic web of circumstance (New Directions).

One-woman play combines tradition with contemporary lore

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dorothy Lichtblau's latest one-woman play, Maiden, Mother, Crone, which she performed recently at the Fringe Festival, is rich in daughter-mother-grandmother wisdom and humor.

It consists of two short plays, both of which combine contemporary lore with traditional roots. They are based on two stories written by Lichtblau and both are accompanied by vocalist-percussionist Miriam (she wants no last name) and directed by Mimi Mekler.

"I wondered how the feminine aspect of God might be manifested in daily life," said Lichtblau, "and the stories that emerged were about women who skillfully tend hearth and home, while also being warriors for justice. They are heroes, who break new ground, guided by compassion, not love of power."

Dorothy Lichtblau

The same ideas pervaded two other plays she presented at previous Fringes, Gezundheit, in 1992, featuring a mother and daughter, and Dining With Friends, in 1993, about a musician in a mid-life crisis. Dining With Friends was also remounted later.

A writer and performer, Lichtblau often reads her own stories in various locales. In addition, she is a freelance writer specializing in women's social issues. She edited and published the magazine Jewish Women's Forum in 1994 and 1995, before financial problems forced the magazine to suspend publication.

A one-time supply teacher, she said she finds herself leaning toward the theatre, both in playwriting and in performing. This year, she is taking a graduate degree at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education on the subject of arts in adult education.

Michael Aychental: Gateway Newstands

Running a franchise a lot like playing Monopoly

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Special to the CJN

RICHMOND HILL — Looking at his business card, one might never guess Michael Aychental is the president of a multi-million-dollar franchise operation.

The card, which reads Gateway Newstands/Gateway Cigar Stores/Michael Aychental, does not mention his title.

Aychental, 50, is the owner of Gateway Newstands, a chain of convenience stores in transit locations, shopping centres and office buildings across North America and the United Kingdom, that sells lottery tickets, magazines and snack foods.

In his spacious office on East Beaver Creek Road, Aychental looks behind him at a map of North America dotted with blue push-pins indicating Gateway stores. "I'm trying to get a pin in every state," he says.

Behind his desk is a framed print of a Monopoly board. "The playing of Monopoly is kind of what we do...the first part of [this] business is acquiring property for our newsstands," Aychental says.

Fourteen years ago, Aychental invested about $5,000 to open his first franchised store on University Avenue in downtown Toronto. In July, the chain reached a milestone with the acquisition of its 300th store.

"[Now] we're the largest operator of newsstands in North America," says Aychental. Last year, the Gateway chain, whose retail sales exceed $50 million, was rated number 1 in its category by Entrepreneur magazine's Franchise 500 listing and is currently expanding at an average of 25 to 30 additional stores annually across Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom.

In the mid-1960s, Aychental left high school in Toronto and began working full time at Fred Thompson Sales. As a junior salesperson, he travelled across Ontario, trying to get the company's products on store shelves. At the age of 20, Aychental went into business for himself, opening four stores in small centres outside of Toronto. The stores, Premier Discount Stores, specialized in health and beauty aids.

Everything progressed well for Aychental's stores until the mid-1970s when interest rates climbed to 24 percent. Aychental was generating limited revenue, had a high debt load and Premier Discount Stores' profits could not support the cost of financing.

In the early '80s, Davis Distributing, a wholesale distributor of merchandise to retail stores, and Premier Discount Stores' major supplier, acquired Aychental's stores. He went to work for their company, beginning as director of retail operations.

Aychental then became manager of Davis Distributing's Double D stores, which sold health and beauty aids and patent medicines. He later became vice-president of sales for Davis.

In 1983, Aychental noticed an increase in the number of immigrants coming into the country wanting to buy small retail stores. He approached the president of Davis with his idea of providing such stores.

The president rejected this proposal due to conflict of interest. He did not want to be in competition with his customers, such as United Cigar Stores and Transit Shops. As well, the retail aspect of Davis Distributing was only a small part of the company.

Aychental began opening convenience stores part time and sold them to prospective franchisees. Before construction of these stores was finished, people were knocking on the door, hoping to purchase them. Aychental's business grew and eventually he quit his job at Davis Distributing to run his expanding business.

In the first few years, he sold about 14 stores in the Greater Toronto Area. They operated under names such as Bay Smoke and Elm Variety. At this stage, he was fighting to gain a foothold in the newsstand market.

"The initial entry into the business was most difficult. We were up against competitors who were in place and established and had already acquired many of the existing prime locations," he says.

In October 1993, Gateway reached a turning point when it began negotiations with The Toronto Transit Commission (TTC) to operate convenience stores within the TTC's system. It put in a tender bid and in May 1994 began opening stores.

Gateway was the first successful bidder in about 40 years to challenge Garfield's long-running operation. Since 1953, Garfield had been the only successful bidder to gain the rights to operate convenience stores within the TTC system. Gateway's acquisition of the lease resulted in a 50 percent increase in the chain's size.

"The acquisition of the TTC newsstands within the subway gave us high visibility throughout North America and was definitely a contributing factor in accelerating our growth," Aychental says.

Gateway and Garfield take different approaches to running their stores. Garfield hires employees and runs its stores corporately. Its costs of operation "prevented them from keeping all stores open because some of them were not high enough volume," says Aychental.

In contrast, Gateway franchises out its stores which are is essentially turnkey operations. Aychental takes care of the primary steps involved in setting up the store, such as acquiring the lease, construction of the store and training. The franchisee then operates the store with Aychental's primary role being to assist in ongoing support of the store, merchandising and obtaining inventory.

Purchasing of equipment and furniture, lease payments and all overhead costs are paid by the franchisee who also pays an up- front fee, which varies for each store depending on its value.

Aychental's costs include the wages of his clerical and management staff at head office, support of the franchisees and the cost of administering and operating his rebate program.

Aychental says his stores are "mom and pop" type operations which are profitable for a family but not as profitable for a corporation. "When you open your own corporate stores, you have to finance them, capitalize them, operate them...A corporation has to hire its own staff and pay its own expenses, whereas the franchisees really are buying themselves a job. They've purchased a franchised business with upfront money and rather than paying staff, they earn the money themselves.

Aychental's franchise system has enabled him to expand. "We concentrate our efforts and our time on the expansion of the business rather than the operation of stores, which is very time-consuming and very labor intensive," he says.

The secret of his success, Aychental says, is that he had the right concept matched with good timing. He adds that Gateway is recession and inflation proof.

"In bad times, you still need to buy a newspaper, have a chocolate bar or buy a magazine. In good times, if prices for a chocolate bar go up 10 cents, it's not an important factor in the economy. You can't price yourself out of the business. What we have is a business that is very steady. That is why it's so attractive to so many individual operators."

Aychental, a member of Beit Rayim Synagogue on Bayview Avenue, has a love of fast machinery. He owns a former race boat which runs at 104 miles per hour, a cigarette boat and a Harley Davidson.

He is a self-described "technological dinosaur." Propped up in his office is a white board that he calls his "computer." It lists how many stores are open, how many are available and how many expired leases he has. While Aychental is not technologically knowledgeable, his company is online.

"What was cute to me was that we made more out of the store than it cost for Noah's education at York. His university education was a positive cash flow," Aychental says with a chuckle.

Aychental plans to open more stores like the one at York University. While he is pleased that Gateway has been successful enough to achieve the milestone of opening 300 stores, his five-year goal is to open his 500th store. He predicts that franchises will continue to grab a larger market share, explaining that franchising is "a much more popular mode of doing business than individual proprietorship."

Aychental says his business philosophy is to work hard in a quest to gain prime property. "I'm working diligently on a daily basis. My job is very simple. It's just to continue to work with the landlord principles to get good locations and establish more stores. It's a simple formula."

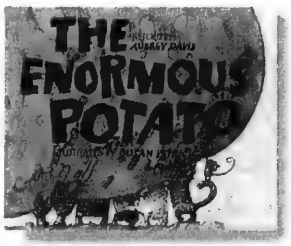
Folktale teaches cooperation

By REVA KAISER
Student Intern

TORONTO — In today's world of action-packed movies and video games, sometimes it's nice to tuck your feet up cozily beneath you and settle down with a book that relays an important, but often unheeded, message.

Storyteller Aubrey Davis has put into print The Enormous Potato, a simple story that he has told and retold to many a captivated child-filled audience.

The Enormous Potato tells the story of a farmer's planted potato which grows and grows and grows. In order to pull it out, he must enlist the help of first his wife, then his daughter, then their dog, their cat, and even the household mouse. Only when everyone has come to help and has lent their hand, is the farmer successful in uprooting the enormous potato.



It's a classic folktale which has come to teach readers the importance of cooperation and how valuable every person's (and animal's) effort is. As well, it preaches sharing, as the whole town comes to join in the potato feast at the end.

Dusan Petricic has added tremendously to the story with his wonderful illustrations. The sunny yellow pages are cheerful and eye-catching, and the energetic pictures on each spread capture the story perfectly, making it easy for young readers to follow along.

The rhythmic verse, captivating illustrations, and heartening lessons are sure to invoke "Read it again, Mommy" from even the youngest of audiences.

THANK YOU, TEACHERS
It's a happy time when students can acknowledge the assistance of their teachers. Here we see Dalia Rotstein, 15, and Jonathan Mandelbaum, 13, thanking Yitzhak Eisner for helping them compete in the 34th annual World Bible Contest in Jerusalem; and Ilana Kipolovic, Grade 6, thanking her teacher Mr. Baker for helping her win the gold medal in the Canadian Pythagoras Math Contest.

Hey Kids! Mazel Tov

Congratulations to Malka Douglas, Rachel Friedman and Tzvi Shore. Their summertime colorings were selected from our hat. Each will receive $20.00 from The CJN.

Soccer impresario planning for 2001 Maccabiah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Get Martin Emil Scott talking about his soccer team and one point comes through loud and clear — and often. Maccabi Toronto is the country's best Jewish sports team, playing at the highest competitive level anywhere.

Sure, there are great Jewish athletes playing in other sports, but they do so as individuals on non-Jewish teams or in Jewish leagues of less than top calibre. Where else will you find a team consisting almost entirely of Jewish players competing together in a city's top amateur league, he asks.

As manager, coach and player with Maccabi Toronto, Scott may be forgiven for tooting his own horn and that of his players. But he believes the Jewish community is just not aware of what a good thing it's got going, as Maccabi Toronto sports the community's colors, so to speak.

It recently fielded a competitive team in the third annual Striker Spirit Soccer Tournament, lining up against the best teams from a variety of Toronto multicultural groups.

Designated "Israel" for the tournament, Maccabi Toronto faced off against the likes of Argentina, Canada, Chile, China, Greece, Nigeria and Poland. Altogether, 16 "countries" were represented.

Although Israel was winless in three games, it lost two of them by the narrowest of margins. After falling to Chile, 2-0 in the opener, Israel gave its competition a real tussle. In its second game, it threw a scare into their opposition, losing a 3-2 heartbreaker to Poland, the eventual tournament runners-up. Israel concluded its matches with a 2-1 loss to Nigeria but it took a penalty kick with less than two minutes remaining to set up the winning goal for the Nigerians.

Some of his best players were in Israel competing in mini-football at the Maccabiah Games. The Canadian team finished sixth of 16 teams at the "Jewish Olympics."

They opened the tournament with a 12-1 shellacking of Croatia and then hammered Singapore 16-1 in game two.

In game three, they faced a much tougher opponent, Israel, and lost 7-4. Despite the three-goal differential, Scott said it was "an excellent score versus Israel."

In the quarter-finals, Canada took on Russia, with the winner advancing to the medal round. The score was 2-2 but a direct kick called late in the game led to a Russian score and relegated Canada to the consolation round.

For Scott, a member of the 1989 Maccabiah team, "it was deja vu all over again." Back in '89, Canada faced Mexico in a tight game and hit the crossbar late in the match. Mexico came down the field immediately afterwards and scored the winning goal, eliminating Canada from medal play. He remembers it as a really disheartening loss, so for Canada to come back at this year's Maccabiah and beat England 4-3 in its next game, showed great character, Scott said. Canada closed out the tournament with a 5-2 loss to Argentina.

Scott, who serves as administrator of the Toronto Services Soccer League (TSSL), the largest adult recreational soccer league in North America, said both the Striker team and the Maccabiah team featured youthful lineups.

Scott believes the talent is there. In his capacity as soccer impresario in Toronto and with his ties to the Maccabi Canada organization (as a talent scout and evaluator), he is currently helping lay the foundation for that Maccabiah entry.

Earlier this season, he moved Maccabi Toronto out of the TSSL and entered them in the Hispanoamerican Soccer League, the city's best amateur rec league, to ensure they'd face the toughest competition. So far this year, they're playing .500 soccer.

For the 1995-96 season, he recruited about 45 mostly Jewish players to stock four teams in local indoor recreational leagues and prepare them for the rigors of possible Maccabiah Games pressure.

He's also located other top Jewish players in Canada, including Dan Sankar, a native of India who played last year for the Toronto Shooting Stars and who lined up for Canada at the Maccabiah Games, as well as Irvin Studin, a midfielder with the Toronto Lynx whose family originated in Russia.

Also on Scott's busy agenda is preparations for a unique tournament for the summer of 1998. With the assistance of a $2,500 grant from the United Jewish Appeal, Scott is planning the inaugural Maccabi Toronto Soccer Club Invitational — an eight-team event that will feature Maccabi Montreal, Maccabi Glasgow and five U.S. Maccabi teams.

He's also planning to take an outdoor team to the Pan American Maccabi Games in Mexico City in 1999.

With the kind of talent already available and being nurtured and with a development program swinging into shape, Scott is optimistic Canada will have a competitive entry when they kick off the 2001 Maccabiah in Israel.

Team Israel goalie Greg Katz blocks a shot versus Poland as defender Ziv Fishman moves in for the rebound.

Maccabiah gold medalist Manitoba's top Jewish athlete

By MYRON LOVE
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Olia Berger, 16, recent winner of a Maccabiah Games gold medal in judo, was named Manitoba Jewish Athlete of the Year at the 25th annual YMHA Jewish Community Centre (JCC) of Winnipeg Sports Dinner.

The Max M. Nusgart Memorial Award was presented to Berger before she competed at the Games.

Berger comes by her judo skills naturally. Her father and coach, Mark Berger, is a former Olympic Games silver medalist and one of Canada's leading coaches.

Olia won seven gold medals in her class during the last year and recently won gold in the provincial championships. She was a finalist for the Nusgart Award for the past two years.

Judoka's father also her coach

The other six finalists included Aaron Pfeffer, another national judo champion and protege of Mark Berger; diver Sari Levitt; synchronized swimmer Allison Katz; tennis player Daniel Kives; cyclist and weightlifter Riva Benditt; and hockey player Randal Shore.

This year's dinner attracted a record turnout of close to 1,000 people. One of the highlights of the evening was the presentation of the JCC 1997 Recognition Award to Ken Kronson, founding chair of the annual dinner. The long-time pharmacist has been a driving force behind the dinner, which has raised close to $2 million over the years to help support the Y's programs.

The evening was hosted by Monty Hall (a former schoolmate of Kronson's), and featured as guest speakers major league baseball manager Sparky Anderson and former Winnipegger Sherry Bassin from the world of professional hockey.

The Inside Back

The ultimate invasion: 'aliens closer to home'

By JORDAN MAX

Last Laugh

There's been a lot of news about space these days, for example, the Mir space station accidents, the Mars Pathfinder mission ($250 million dollars and they forgot to remove the lens cap?), the 50th anniversary of an alleged UFO crash and the annual summer alien contact/invasion movies. As if we didn't have enough tzuris of our own, we need to worry about aliens from other planets? (no, I'm not talking about Ashkenazim, Sephardim, Litvaks or Galitzianers here)

Now before we get all worked up, let's step back for a minute and try to figure out why anyone from a presumably more intelligent or highly developed planet would even want to visit here, much less take it over.

Is Earth their rustic cottage equivalent? Do they have to use up their intergalactic Light Year points before the next millennium? Did they run out of salsa, beer or high fat snack foods on the trip? Do they want to learn a little Torah or visit the Kotel? Did the males piloting the ship make a wrong turn at the last Nebula and need to ask directions but are ashamed to admit it? Have they been monitoring our fine television offerings and are impressed by the high calibre of daytime talk shows and soap operas? Is their Baywatch reception too fuzzy? Perhaps they can sense the process of societal decay and see that Earth is ripe for conquest? I just don't know.

Hypothetically assuming there is intelligent life out there that has some bizarre interest in visiting this planet, I asked myself what I would do if I encountered some real live aliens. Since no etiquette books cover this situation, I'm going to have to wing it.

Now, the Jewish perspective on visitors, regardless of place of origin, is hachnasat orchim, one of offering hospitality or even refuge to guests, providing they don't trash the place or leave radioactive intergalactic goo stains on the carpet (definitely the toughest ones to get out).

I think we would instinctively offer them something to drink, ask them where they're from and if they know our distant cousins on Alpha Centauri (well, at least it seems like they live on Alpha Centauri). If they turned out to be the trash-the-planet types, we'd serve them some reheated leftover Shabbat cholent, guaranteed to induce sleepiness and cause that uncomfortable bloaty feeling.

Of course, if they emerged from their spacecraft wearing shtreimels and long black coats and speaking Yiddish, I'd ask whether they were Litvak or Galitzianer, Cohen, Levi or Yisrael, where they live, whether their planet provides government funding of religious day schools, and if I could get a green card.

However, if we look at movies in the alien invader genre, clearly the most chilling plots are not the full-frontal-attack type, but the more insidious, planted-among-us-waiting-to-strike plots.

I feel I have a certain first-hand expertise in this area. You see, my house was first invaded by small alien beings some six years ago. It all began so innocuously. At first, they were cute and angelic, and we naively welcomed them one by one in with love.

Soon, according to their nefarious plot, they began to endear themselves to us, first by those da-da's, then by their genetic resemblance, and their first steps and words.

Then their devious plot unfolded as we watched helplessly while these aliens' voracious appetites for love, attention, snack foods and clothing grew exponentially.

By now their toys are hopelessly disassembled and scattered throughout the house, the fridge is filled with small leftovers and artwork from their school and other programs piles up until the only sane option is to surrender. Once they've taken over your house, there's no telling where they'll stop.

Just like in the movies, the truth is only beginning to dawn on me, only after it's too late to stop the ultimate invasion. And the scariest part of all? We still love these little creatures. Now that's what I call a thriller.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

I'm two classes short of graduating from high school and I'm registered to go to school this fall, but I don't want to go. I don't think formal education is going to help me find a job anyway. The problem is my parents. They want me to stay in school. We have many "discussions," which leave me feeling angry, depressed and confused.

Dear Reader,

There are many people in your situation these days, so don't feel alone. We are in a time when occupational decision-making is extremely difficult.

To the rescue is a new CD-Rom called Knowledge for Youth About Careers (KYAC).

KYAC is a program that addresses the issues you are wrestling with. It emphasizes being proactive in occupational decision-making and illustrates how to do this. The program is designed for youth aged approximately 14 to 30 and is sensitive to issues facing women, minorities and disabled persons.

After exploring career choices, the program teaches job search techniques and offers examples of success stories from real people.

People who have tried KYAC reported feeling an increased confidence in their career-related decisions.

The program is widely available at Career Counselling Centres in British Columbia and Alberta. For locations on viewing the program in other provinces or for information on purchasing the program, contact ProVision at 604-872-3575.

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

'Where terror lurks'

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Meet millionaire Kamal Hamadeh, owner of gas stations in the Gaza Strip and someone who by his own admission loves to booze it up and chase skirts.

Hamadeh, who represents Israeli companies in the Arab world and crosses regularly into Israel, went on a business and family trip in May. In Germany, he met his nephew who asked for a favor.

According to Israeli prosecutors, the nephew, a member of Islamic Jihad, wanted Hamadeh to smuggle bombs and terrorists over the Green Line. At first, the prosecutors say, Hamadeh dismissed the request, but the nephew wouldn't give up, so his uncle agreed.

Commentary

Today, Hamadeh is in an Ashkelon prison under investigation. Security sources are not certain he meant to carry out his alleged promise to his nephew, but once it was made, they say, Jihad agents would not have given him any choice.

To security officials in Israel, the Hamadeh episode is evidence of how, in times of political tension, virtually any Palestinian can be recruited into terrorism. Some, like Hamadeh, might be unwilling soldiers. But others, even those who have little in common with the religious zealots, are eager to help.

This explains the recent suicide bombings in Machane Yehuda, as well as the capture of a Palestinian squad allegedly about to embark on a bombing spree of the New York City subway system the following day.

The two cases show how Palestinian terrorism today is nourished by a wide range of militants whose shared purpose is to attack Israeli and Jewish targets, including subway stations in heavily Jewish neighborhoods. Experts say their

Jews accused of planning a holocaust

Arab-language paper repeats allegation

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Arab-language newspaper published in Montreal has repeated an accusation that Jews are planning a holocaust against Arabs.

The claim was one of a number of unsupported allegations contained in a column in the June 4 edition of the newspaper, Al-Miraat (The Mirror) that included the suggestion that "Israeli extremists and their agents abroad" might put Al-Miraat's column writer's life in danger.

The article, written by Farrid Habshy, is titled "I Demand An Explanation and Apology From the Insanes." It is ostensibly a response to an April 10 CJN article that reported on a diatribe that appeared in the March 5 issue of Al-Miraat. The March 5 article first raised the allegation of a holocaust against Arabs and went on to charge Jews with dominating the world's media, controlling the U.S. administration and engaging in social engineering on a world scale.

The CJN had suggested that the March 5 Al-Miraat article resembled neo-nazi propaganda.

On June 4, Habshi wrote: "And all that the paper achieved by this article is that it gave a definite ...example of what I was saying and that is a lot of the organizations which in their name [have] the word 'Jewish' are nothing but wolves wearing sheep skins in order to infiltrate between the herd and then

Righteous Gentile

TORONTO — Roelof Vis was honored as a Righteous Gentile last week by Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, at a special ceremony organized by the Consulate General of Israel.

As a teenager during World War II, Vis was an active member of the Resistance. He helped secure "safe houses" where Jewish people could be hidden from the Nazis. Vis' family, with eight children of their own, also sheltered and hid many children.

Vis, now retired, moved to Canada in 1981.

Vis was designated the title of Righteous Among the Nations, for his role in helping save Jewish people from the Holocaust. He was also awarded a medal, a certificate of honor and his name was inscribed at the Yad Vashem Museum in Jerusalem.

Jewish Cultural Assets

NEW YORK – The Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture has launched a major effort to create a "comprehensive inventory" of Jewish cultural assets throughout Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union.

The foundation sees the program as leading to a plan for "restoring, preserving and enhancing" these assets.

The project will focus on countries that suffered under Nazi occupation and important areas of Jewish settlement.

Jewish Television Channel

PARIS – Europe and Israel will soon have a television channel with Jewish programming.

In early 1998, the Shalom Channel plans to begin broadcasting simultaneously in Paris, London, Moscow and Tel Aviv.

Property Returned

ROME – Italy has handed over to the Italian Jewish community valuables plundered by the Nazis during World War II.

"The bags don't contain treasures, but behind them there are destroyed families, deportations and human suffering," Treasury Minister Carlo Azeglio Ciampi said during the recent ceremony marking the return of the items.

He called the bags "a treasure of memory and a warning to never forget."

The return of the property was triggered by a law passed by parliament last month.

Govt. allocates $250,000 to seniors' services

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Massive changes in health care have led to a $250,000 new grant from the Ontario government for home services to seniors in the Metro Jewish community.

"It will mean thousands more hours of service to a significantly increased number of families," said Michael Scheinert, executive director of Senior Care, which provides services to the Jewish elderly.

The money enables Senior Care to expand its respite care service, its friendly visiting program which assists families coping with a chronic or terminal illness, its educational groups for family caregivers and its mutual support groups for those with early or mild dementia.

"There are massive changes in the home care field, partly as a result of hospital restructuring, and partly because it is much more competitive," said Scheinert.

With the new grant, respite care services can be offered 24 hours a day, seven days a week, on an emergency or planned basis, if necessary, though in most cases they will be needed for only two or three days, he said.

The grant also means more money for the Habayit Shelanu residence of 59 units in the Spadina Rd.-Davenport Rd. area operated by Senior Care. Access to 24-hour- care will now be part and parcel of its service to residents.

The Senior Care program of security checks and telephone reassurance will be expanded. There will be a program of transporting people to doctors and other places, a joint initiative with the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living.

Senior Care has been the largest provider of services to Jewish elderly in Toronto for 25 years.

YARD SALE FOR ISRAEL

Terror suspect lived in Canada

TORONTO — One of two men arrested in New York on suspicion of planning a subway bombing lived for two years in Canada, obtained refugee status and remained here despite two criminal convictions.

Gazi Ibrahim Abu Mezer, 23, lived in the Metro Toronto area from September 1993 to November 1995. During that time, he was convicted of credit card fraud and assault and was given a conditional discharge. Less than five months later, while still on probation, he was charged with the sexual assault of a woman in an elevator. He pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of assault and was given more probation.

On arriving in Canada from the West Bank, Abu Mezer received a student visa and a work permit. News reports indicate he has Israeli and Jordanian citizenship.

Spokespeople for Immigration Canada declined to comment on Abu Mezer, saying details of his refugee claim and other immigration matters are protected by the Privacy Act.

Abu Mezer and an associate, Lafi Khalil, 22, were shot and arrested by FBI agents in their Brooklyn apartment during a pre-dawn raid. Police said their arrest narrowly averted a planned subway bombing.

Exploring the future of U.S. Jewry

Disagreements and differences of opinion between debaters are part of the deep structure of Jewish intellectual history and pedagogical method.

The pages of the Talmud are living proof of the importance, and indeed at times even of the seeming sanctity of legitimate questioning. No subject was considered to be beyond exploration; no question was inappropriate when raised l'shem shamayim, for the sake of heaven, that is, for the sake of honestly advancing an argument and seeking out the truth.

It should come therefore as no surprise that sharp disagreements and differences of opinion are being expressed among educators, analysts, writers and community leaders both religious and lay, about the condition of the Jewish present and about the possibilities for the Jewish future.

For example, last week I reproduced for readers a statement by the Institute of Contemporary Jewry at the Hebrew University that had been published in the Jerusalem Report that "the world Jewish population will never again reach the pre-World War II total of 16.5 million...

The conclusions of the institute were based upon its own research and upon the much-referenced National Jewish Population Survey conducted in 1990 in the United States on behalf of the Council of Jewish Federations.

Last week, however, in an article that appeared in the New York Times, J.J. Goldberg, the American author, directly challenged the accuracy of the 1990 survey and the reliability of the conclusions that have been drawn from its data.

Goldberg categorically refuted one of the core findings of the 1990 survey which had claimed that 52 percent of American Jews were intermarrying.

"The intermarriage rate is not 52 percent , but around 38 percent. The number of Jews in this country is not decreasing; it's on the rise. There are 6 million Jews in the United States, not 5.5 million.

"The mistaken numbers arose from a series of petty missteps in the 1990 study..."

In his article, Goldberg set out to discredit the 1990 survey. He may very well be correct in his assessment of its accuracy. I have no way of choosing between the figures. It is for sociologists and demographers to judge which figures are accurate.

Even if we accept the correctness of his assertion that 38 percent of Jews are intermarrying, the sense of alarm is not diminished, but rather only its urgency.There is no comfort in a figure which suggests that almost four out of every 10 Jews are choosing to marry a non-Jewish partner. Moreover, if we remove the number of intermarried couples from the greater New York area, which would tend to drive the overall number downward, the 38 percent statistic will jump dramatically higher.

But in his article, Goldberg also set out to discredit the individuals and organizations who have attempted to mobilize a concerted, vigorous, communal response to what he calls the "panic" caused by the 1990 survey results. In doing so, however, he reveals more about himself and his biases than about the call-to-Jewish-action that he attempts to impugn.

He categorizes that response as "one long favored by Orthodox rabbis...a return to the ghetto. For two centuries they (the Orthodox rabbis) have peddled this message without success." (Our emphasis)

He then dismisses the communal response because it "has been taken up by secular Jewish neoconservatives," whom he clearly dislikes.

"None of this, of course, (the call for a Jewish reawakening) has the least chance of engaging most American Jews. They remain steadfastly liberal in their religious and political leanings."

This "statement of principle" by Goldberg leads quite ironically and poignantly to a provocative article entitled After Zionism by Hillel Halkin, the noted Israeli writer, translator and journalist, which appeared in the June 1997 volume of Commentary.

The article is typically Halkin: eloquent but jarring. He reflects upon the future of the Jewish people, a subject on which he wrote exactly 20 years ago in his book Letters to an American Jewish Friend: A Zionist Polemic.

Halkin never explicitly explains the reason for the title of the essay. He merely begins with the assumption that Zionism has failed because it could not lure the Diaspora out of its existence.

In the course of his argument, however, he provides a number of insightful observations of Jewish life in Israel and in the United States, one of which is directly responsive though opposite to the "statement of principle" enunciated by J.J. Goldberg.

Goldberg views American Jewry's steadfast liberal leanings in religion and politics as a great strength.

In terms of the Jewish future of American Jewry, Halkin sees it as quite the opposite.

"Judaism...has something to say to American Jews only if it is prepared to be unsparingly adversarial...Most of what it has traditionally stood for – obedience to divine and human authority, subordination of the individual, unremitting self-discipline and self-restraint, devotion to textual study, the necessity for endless repetition, vigilant regulation of bodily functions, the supreme importance of the family and procreation, consistent gender differentiation, hierarchical distinctions in all walks of life – is profoundly antithetical to the values of contemporary liberal American society.

"The majority of American Jews will want nothing to do with this. And as Jews, they or their children will disappear." (My emphasis)

We can expect more discussion, more differences of opinion and more disagreement on this subject. Despite the disagreements or perhaps more accurately precisely on account of them, there is indeed one conclusion which we can draw with unassailable certainty: Jewish life is too rewarding and its legacy too precious for any of us to become complacent about its future.

UJA Women's Campaign head stresses tzedakah's social benefits

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's surprising how many people don't give to UJA simply because they're not asked, says 1998 Women's Campaign chair Agi Mandel.

Perhaps Mandel wouldn't have given so much of her time as a community volunteer had a neighbor not asked her to canvass for UJA some 17 years ago.

"I've always gotten back more than I've given," said Mandel, 44, in a recent interview at her home. "The sense that you're part of something larger than yourself and your little circle is quite special. The work that we do helps the most needy and vulnerable in our community. It embodies our most basic Jewish value of tikkun olam."

A registered dietician by training, Mandel found that volunteer work met a creative need after her children, now 20 and 17, were born.

She has also been involved with Bialik Day School and Jewish Women's Federation, of which her twin sister, Susan Michaels, is a vice-president.

"I want to emphasize that this [UJA] communal campaign remains the central vehicle promoting social justice for and on behalf of all Jews — with the emphasis on all," she said.

In light of recent divisive issues such as Israel's proposed conversion bill, Mandel noted that UJA dollars "fund all kinds of pluralism-supporting programs."

Agi Mandel

Shlichim for Pluralism, sponsored by the Masorti movement, is one such recipient, she said, also mentioning other fledgling movements supported by Masorti (Conservative in Israel) or the Israeli Movement for Progressive Judaism.

Israeli recipients also include shelters for abused women, she noted.

But over half the money raised is spent locally, she pointed out. The prime expenditure here is Jewish education, which is "very heavily" subsidized.

"We're a very fortunate and giving community, but a great deal of work remains to be done, especially in the areas of poverty and government cutbacks." Other priorities here include continuity-related projects.

Most of the money sent abroad funds the continued aliyah from the former Soviet Union as well as rescue of Jews from dangerous regions and absorption of new immigrants in Israel.

A child of Holocaust survivors who escaped Czechoslovakia in 1950, Mandel was raised to believe she was privileged to live in Canada.

Her parents were helped along the way by the Jewish community in Vienna and Mandel's father "raised us to believe there's nothing nicer than giving tzedakah. My mother, having lost so much of her family, saw it in very practical terms: Jews need to help Jews."

Two years ago, UJA solicited three-year pledges, an innovative strategy which allowed volunteer s more time to solicit new donors, about 500 of whom made pledges.

Mandel wants her small army of volunteers – the board alone has some 175 women – to know how much their efforts are valued. "We can't do it without them."

Despite multiple time demands facing most women, Mandel believes there has been a renewed recognition of the importance of community work. "It's not only about material progress."

New Yiddish committee chair

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Love of mamaloshen is taking Israeli-born Ethel Cooper, a child of Holocaust survivors, in a new direction.

Cooper, whose first words as a child were in Yiddish, and who is now a Yiddish teacher at Bialik Hebrew Day School, has become chair of UJA Federation Yiddish committee, succeeding Gerry Kane.

The committee oversees the spending of $60,000 to $70,000 a year to promote Yiddish culture in its myriad forms, only $9,000 of which is supplied by UJA Federation. The rest of the money is raised by volunteers.

Cooper, who was brought to Canada at the age of two and went through the public school system (in addition to eight years of after-school study at the I.L. Peretz Workmen's Circle) never lost her love or use of Yiddish.

One of her priorities is expanding the teaching of Yiddish in the Jewish day school system. She was chair of a sub-committee on Yiddish education before stepping into Kane's shoes

Bialik is the only school which teaches Yiddish as part of its curriculum, said Cooper, whose two daughters Rachel, 11, and Toba, 9, attend the school.

"I know from what my graduates tell me, and from how appreciative their parents are, that Yiddish has helped them to connect to their roots," she said.

In her own case, she said, she was "surrounded" by Yiddish when she worked for seven years at the YIVO Institute in New York. At that time she was married to her first husband, now deceased, also a child of survivors.

Cooper, a member of the Friends of Yiddish, is bullish about a revival of Yiddish culture and sees many heartening signs on the horizon, including an interest among young

Koschitzky helps launch Bar-Ilan department

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a youngster, Mira Koschitzky would have been hard pressed to imagine that one day there would be a State of Israel, let alone that she would receive an honorary doctorate there.

Earlier this summer Bar-Ilan University presented her with an honorary doctorate for community leadership and commitment to religious Zionist education.

From Israel, Koschitzky and a family contingent — including Saul, Mira's husband of 40 years, and all three of their grown children — travelled to her native Czechoslovakia where she was one of two Bar-Ilan board members to hood Czech president Vaclav Havel as he too was awarded an honorary doctorate by the university. The ceremony was held at the Presidential Castle in Prague.

While in Israel, Mira and Saul Koschitzky, both long-time community leaders and philanthropists, also dedicated Bar-Ilan University's Land of Israel Studies Department, in memory of her parents, Vilma and Frank Martin (Szusz).

"We tried to do something my parents would like," Koschitzky said during a recent interview in her North York home's airy library, with its array of Jewish tomes, framed newspaper clippings and assorted family photos.

Reflecting on the newly dedicated department's interdisciplinary curriculum, Koschitzky expressed her belief that subjects such as archeology, history and religion are "all important things for young Jewish people to learn."

For its 800 students, including 20 doctoral candidates, the curriculum encompasses "different phases of Jewish life. I like that. I think my parents would have too."

Fostering education is a familiar concept to the Koschitzkys, who, with Saul's brother and sister-in-law Henry and Julia Koschitzky, were among the founders of Toronto's Yeshivat Bnei Akiva High Schools, Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot.

One of Koschitzky's most vivid childhood memories, of which she spoke at the dedication, is a clandestine Seder in wartime Europe. Then a frightened 7-year-old, Mira, her sister Lili and their parents were living outwardly as Christians, but on that night heavily blanketed windows concealed them from the outside world. All they had to mark the holiday were two candles and two pieces of matzot.

"My father was very determined," she recalls.

The family remained together until August 1944, after which the children were separated from their parents. Hidden in neighboring villages until the following January, they were able to live together again, finally immigrating to Canada in 1948, when Koschitzky was 12.

After graduating from Harbord Collegiate, Koschitzky completed a Bachelor of Arts in Political Science and Economics at the University of Toronto, opting for a year of study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem after her first year at U of T.

Koschitzky's parents, who were strongly committed but not religious Jews, "instilled in me the importance of peaceful coexistence between Jews of all backgrounds," she said.

In that spirit, Bar-Ilan "tries to bring religious and non-religious together," she added.

Although Koschitzky's parents were ardent Zionists and her mother was active in Hadassah, it's her husband she credits for motivating her to take an active community role. "We come from a family where working for the community is part of what you do as a Jew," Koschitzky said.

A past national executive chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, she has also been actively involved in the parents' association of Associated Hebrew Schools, UJA Federation, Hadassah and Baycrest Hospital, to name a few. In the 1980s, she worked to secure the freedom of Israel's current industry and trade minister Natan Sharansky, then imprisoned in the former Soviet Union.

The fact that Sharansky received an honorary doctorate (for bravery, commitment to Jewish identity, and leadership) along with her was an indication to her of "how the world, thank G-d, has changed for the better." (Other recipients were retired Israeli Supreme Court Justice Menachem Elon; Yale University professor of child psychiatry, pediatrics and psychology, Donald J. Cohen; Torah scholar Rabbi Yoseph Kapach; and philanthropist Lorenz Cederbaum of Germany.)

Canadian Ambassador to Israel David Berger, who attended the dedication, praised Koschitzky for promoting education and a strong sense of values. "Mira Koschitzky is proof that people can make a difference."

Basya Hunter was dominant force in Toronto theatre

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Basya Hunter, a dominant force in Toronto theatre for many years, died at Baycrest Hospital July 29 at the age of 85.

Obituary

A woman of amazing energy and talent, she was best known as the director of the Holy Blossom Temple Players and the drama teacher of well-known actors and directors, including Ted Kotcheff, William Shatner, Toby Robins and John Drainie.

Busy as she was, she had time to comfort and help actors and others, who benefited from her sensitive nature and compassion.

Born in 1911 in Minsk, Russia, she came to America as a girl of three and by age 12 she was directing plays on the sidewalks of New York's east side.

In New York she wrote an unpublished book, When the Lamps are Lit, on the history of her family and the evolution of Judaism.

As a young woman of 18, she went to Russia to study under Stanislovsky at the Moscow Arts Theatre and later at Rheinehart Theatre in Germany. On the boat to Russia, she met Peter Hunter, a young activist, whom she was later to marry.

Thousands of people saw the plays she directed at Holy Blossom Temple in the 1950s, dramas which looked closely at the American dream and at social ferment in other countries. They included Death of a Salesman, The Crucible, All My Sons and Cry, the Beloved Country.

With her husband, who was active in the peace movement, she lived for a time in England and other countries of Europe.

Basya Hunter in 1977.

In the late 1950s, she set up the Arts Theatre at the old University of Toronto Theatre on St. George Street where she directed The Iceman Cometh.

During the 1960s and 1970s, she was teaching drama privately and at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute. It was during this time that she turned to writing her own plays. A drama about the famous Russian author Solzhenitsyn was produced locally. But the play for which she was best known, and for which she did prodigious research, was Johannes and The Talmud, about racial intolerance in Europe. It was given three productions in Toronto because of its wide popularity, in 1977 at Tarragon Theatre, in 1979-80 at St. Michael's College and in 1988 at Leah Posluns Theatre.

Wide popularity

She suffered a major stroke in 1988, and was at Baycrest since 1991. Though she lost the use of her voice, she was mentally alert until three years ago, according to her son, lawyer David Hunter of Toronto.

Her husband, Peter, predeceased her in December 1996.

In addition to her son, she is survived by her daughter-in-law, Janet, and a grandson, Ari, 18, a McGill University student who competed this summer in basketball at the Maccabiah games in Israel. Also surviving are two brothers, Rubin and Louis, and two nephews, Jonathan and Joshua, all of New York.

A private funeral service led by Ralph Wintrob, a theatre colleague, was followed by burial at Pardes Shalom cemetery.

A memorial service is to be held at Holy Blossom Temple, Sept. 7, from 4 to 6 p.m. in the Maurice Eisendrath Auditorium where her plays were presented.

The one not there

At a certain point in their deliberations last week, nine of Canada's 10 premiers and the two territorial leaders finally decided to stop whispering the words that needed to be spoken in full voice: national unity. Unfortunately, that point came only on the last day of their annual conference. But at least the words were spoken and the message was sent: the future of the federation is the country's paramount priority.

The 11 leaders agreed to meet in the autumn to resume the constitutional debate, although most of them were loathe to even use the term constitution in describing what they had agreed to.

By all accounts, Premier Roy Romanow of Saskatchewan was the driving force behind the decision to place national unity on the conference agenda, albeit in this truncated form. In what the Globe and Mail described as "an emotional plea" he convinced his colleagues to confront the issue despite the familiar threat from Lucien Bouchard that he would absent himself from any discussion on national unity. Canadians owe Saskatchewan's premier a debt of gratitude. He refused to concede to the premier from Quebec a de facto veto over what the premiers could or could not discuss.

The issue of national unity was placed on the agenda; Bouchard left the room; the other leaders, no longer cringing, agreed to discuss the matter some months hence in the fall; Bouchard returned to the chamber and to no one's surprise, announced that he would not attend the autumn meeting. He was, after all, being true to his vow after the last referendum that he would never sit again at the constitutional table to discuss any form of renewed federalism.

His refusal to meet with his colleagues in the fall to discuss renewed federalism leaves the other premiers no option but to appeal directly to the people of Quebec. This is no easy matter.

The legal and practical issues surrounding separation are complex, weighed down with an inflamed, impassioned history, and fraught with severe consequences for all Quebecers and all Canadians. And the separatists will always have the last word in Quebec.

Only one premier was absent, and will be absent, from the constitutional table. The symbolism is obvious. Thankfully, the others did not defer and did not surrender to the one who was not there.

Mission impossible

Now it is Dennis Ross. Soon it will be Madeleine Albright. The Americans are attempting to salvage what they and much of the western world perceive to be a severely foundering, if not already-wrecked, peace process. Ross arrived in the region last Sunday. As of this writing, he is still there, attempting to lay the groundwork for Albright's first visit later this month to Israel as U.S. secretary of state. If Ross succeeds at this preliminary stage, Albright is expected to bring both Benjamin Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat together to discuss expediting the peace process.

The atmosphere in the region is tense. Relations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority are more acrimonious and untrusting than they have ever been. Hamas and Islamic Jihad have threatened to kill more Jews. And a shooting war between Israel and Hezbollah appears to have resumed in the north.

Ross' mission is difficult.

May it only prove however not to be impossible.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"Emancipation has totally changed the nature of the Jew...the law assured the Jews that they were full citizens of their country. The Jews hastened in a kind of intoxication to burn their boats. They had now other connections and were no longer forced to exist only with their co-religionists."

Ordering a falafel in Barrie

I sympathize with Viva Press's distress at finding Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem overrun with outlets of American fast-food chains (CJN, July 31). However, I would like to report a different, and perhaps complementary, experience.

Recently, I was in the audience at a large rock festival (Another Roadside Attraction) in Barrie, Ont. I went to the food tent for lunch, and the menu consisted of hot dogs, hamburgers, french fries, pizza, and — falafel! Needless to say, out of curiosity if nothing else, I ordered the falafel. To be sure, the person behind the counter was a little unsure about what to put in the falafel and how to serve it. Nor did it measure up to falafels I had eaten in Israel, or even downtown Toronto. Nevertheless, it was a recognizable falafel, and quite tasty at that.

So, even as we decry the Americanization of the world, it is worth remembering that the mixing of cultures works both ways.

Dash of realism needed

We can no longer trade with the currency of the Holocaust for world sympathy. We can no longer present the horribleness of Hamas as an advance for sympathy from non-Jews, for they are impressed by the motivation of people who are prepared to blow themselves up with their innocent victims.

It's time to stop dreaming.

Says CJN missed the boat on Maccabiah

I was very disappointed to read only old and rehashed "news" in The CJN. (July 31) The juniors and the seniors and the masters should all be included. The committee works so hard to get Jewish athletes involved and so much money is spent to send a formidable team.

Our grandson was a gold and a bronze medalist in junior gymnastics, but did not get mentioned. Jordan Bohnen was a bronze medalist in junior tennis. Where were the names of the softball players who won gold medals? No mention of the spectacular closing ceremonies put on by JNF. You seem to be missing the real spirit and intent here.

Did someone act kindly to you today?

I am collecting true stories, poems and illustrations about "acts of kindness" extended to you (all ages) in Canada for a book entiled Book of Acts.

I want original stories, poems and artwork, stories about "acts of kindness" extended to you by others (family members, mentors, pets, friends and strangers). Write about an act of kindness that you have observed, or a true story that someone else has related to you. The stories can be spectacular, like someone saved your life. On the other hand, they can be simple everyday actions, like when that special someone made you smile when you were depressed. Travel "acts of kindness" stories may entail incidents encountered on planes, trains, automobiles, transit, camping trips, cruises, honeymoons and hitchhiking. I will accept tape recordings if you feel uncomfortable writing.

Each written submission should be no longer than 1,000 words. Please send typed, double-spaced manuscripts including your name, address and phone number.

My aim is to send Book of Acts I to the publisher by the end of August. Ten percent of the royalties I receive will go to Canadian non-profit organizations/charities of my choosing.

Stories written by children and teens are especially sought after.

A tribute to Morris Kaufman

To Morris Kaufman, the greatest joy was the sight of Jewish children in a Jewish day school.

It was during Associated Hebrew School's Leslie Street Building Campaign (1979 to 1985) that Kaufman surpassed all his previous achievements. As co-chair with John H. Daniels, Henry Koschitzky and Sam Shainhouse, Kaufman directly and indirectly helped raise 75% of the $11 million that built the Danilack Campus.

Morris Kaufman was a great Canadian, a proud Jew, a mentsh. He was my mentor and I will cherish his friendship forever.

Are there secret codes in the Bible?

By B. BARRY LEVY

Throughout the millennia, people have always delighted in seeking out and claiming to find secret mesages encrypted within the text of the Bible. Efforts at decoding the Bible have been the subject of several recent books, including M. Drosnin, The Bible Code (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1997), and R. M. Haralick and M. Glazerson, The Torah Codes and Israel Today (Jerusalem: Lev Eliyahu, 1997).

The CJN asked Barry Levy, Professor of Jewish Studies at McGill University and Dean of McGill's Faculty of Religious Studies, to comment on the phenomenon.

Modern claims to have discovered in the Bible hints of future events, especially mass destructions, share much with what motivated pseudonymous writers of apocalyptic books, who, in late antiquity, attributed to early Bible characters detailed knowledge of the future. It seems that God's forewarning Abraham, Moses or Joseph about the Babylonian exile or the destructions of the Temple limited the horrors of these events as perceived by subsequent generations and strengthened their faith in divine omniscience and omnipotence. So, too, with the present search for encoded messages about the Holocaust, Yitzhak Rabin's assassination or a modern Armageddon.

Some mathematicians say the probability that the decoded messages are accidents is virtually nil, while others disagree; but because these decoded messages can be validated statistically, we are expected to set aside any philosophical or theological objections to them. Even if the entire process is mathematically valid, does that give it priority over every other form of human knowledge? Bible scholars, for example, have no use for this endeavor, which shares none of their assumptions and conclusions. Statisticians may have overstepped their limits.

Halachah cannot support the decoders' claims either, because it does not sustain the belief in a letter-perfect text. Despite the halachic preference that all Torah scrolls be identical, a universal text containing 304,805 letters — one preferred form — exists only among preselected copies. All are not identical; in fact, the past 2,000 years have witnessed numerous rabbinic debates about hundreds of spelling variations in the Torah and thousands in the entire Bible.

The Bible, particularly the Torah, may be the most accurate text transmitted by hand since antiquity, but major theoretical differences exist between high level accuracy, one copy defined as letter-perfect and letter-perfect unanimity among thousands of extant hand-made copies and printed editions. Rabbinic discussions of variant spellings usually impact on meaning no more than, for example, spelling the word "colour" with or without the "u," but such deviations are of great consequence with respect to claims about a letter-perfect text and the search for encoded messages based on letter counts. A difference of one letter changes everything and there are questions about many letters.

Rashi mentioned a few in his Torah commentary; over 20 are listed in Rabbi Akiba Eiger's Gilyon HaShas to Shabbat 55b.

Many more are discussed in an important and halachically authoritative (but under-utilized) 17th-century Bible commentary by Y. S. Norzi, Minhat Shai. In fact, the Talmud, the midrashim, and the Tosafists often interpreted spellings that differ from those in our Bibles. Some medieval Sephardim denounced the association of spelling and meaning; some Ashkenazim who disagreed interpreted words two ways in order to accommodate spelling variations!

In trying to fix the text, rabbinic responsa weigh the evidence of Torah scrolls and Masorah codices; talmudic and midrashic discussions; writings of grammarians, halachists, scribes and experts on scribal matters; tikkunim (model scribal notebooks); oral traditions among practising scribes; and even printed books. These sources often disagree about textual details. Their consideration may lead to halachically valid determinations, but not necessarily to the original text.

Though some medieval writers defended the notion that all Torah scrolls should be and could be letter-perfect, Rabbi Moses Isserles ruled that during a public reading, one does not replace a Torah scroll containing a mistake or defective spelling (i.e., the presence or absence of a vav or yod that is used as a vowel letter), because "our Torah scrolls are not so accurate." In so doing, he relied on the teachings of Rabbenu Tam and successive generations of like-minded Ashkenazi rabbis. Rabbi Yehezkel Landau refused to replace such a faulty Torah, because the replacement could be assumed to contain other similar errors. Rabbi Moses Sofer taught that scribes do not recite a blessing before commencing to write a Torah, because no one knows how to spell all the words. Some halachic authorities said this situation renders it impossible to produce a proper Torah scroll!

Because many of these variants are documented in ancient rabbinic works, some writers date the production of the definitive Torah text to the Middle Ages. This requires abandoning any association between the decoded messages and Mosaic spelling, and relocating the claim for the text's accuracy in medieval, not biblical, times. Even reliance on one preselected model is difficult; the earliest possible choices are medieval, and their use cannot lead to textual certainty. Despite Maimonides' seeming acceptance of the so-called Aleppo Codex, that manuscript lacks almost the entire Torah and cannot provide the model unless reconstructed from witnesses; even its own authority was challenged in medieval times. Other codices are less authoritative; other forms of textual determination are highly subjective and prone to error.

Belief in the presence of encoded messages often leads to a circular argument. The text is letter-perfect, so the decoding is valid, and the messages are meaningful, so the text must be accurate. If the letter-perfect text cannot be validated independently — and it cannot be — one uniform text no longer exists. Therefore, belief in encoded messages can be sustained only if one posits that the encoder anticipated all future spelling doubts and validated all of the resultant variations.

This notion may seem preposterous, but it is not new. It was espoused by Kabbalists who recognized the existence of textual variations and also believed the Torah contained extensive esoteric teachings, but they taught it as a general principle and did not apply it systematically, as the decoders do.

If different texts can all be valid, and decoded messages are to be used for prognosticating, the existence of variant texts suggests another possibility. A particular Ashkenazi scroll may hold the most authoritative predictions about sporting events or American presidents, while Sephardi scrolls may be most useful for predictions related to disease or the weather. Yemenite scrolls may be best for the stock market or Israeli politics. The (reconstructed) Aleppo Codex may be most accurate at anticipating the outcomes of military engagements.

Alternatively, one may ask why the absurdities inherent in all this should even concern us, much less tempt us to dismiss all other rational considerations. The simple answer is that, for vastly different reasons, many people are unable to take seriously the surface messages of the Torah: required faith in God, divine interference in some aspects of history, troubling stories, sacred and immutable commandments, values and regulations that challenge freedom of action and modern attitudes, and the like.

Rather, people are focused on modern history and politics, on Israel, on the Holocaust and, quite like earlier generations, on the fear of global destruction. But they remain intrigued by the Bible and are seriously moved by the same mystical-magical considerations that influenced many earlier generations of Jewish readers, whose confrontations with the text serve as both stimulus and model for the present one. Moreover, they prefer to project their ideas into the text rather than to extract the original, articulated ideas from the text.

Impressed by modern technologies capable of doing exhaustive manipulations that imitate the isolated ones of earlier times, contemporary readers are finding comfort in a system of reading that reinforces their personal needs, accommodates their concerns and restores some of the Bible's mystique in a seemingly scientific way, but avoids the text's real issues and enables them to co-opt it for totally different purposes. Christians are actively pursuing this approach because it allows them to affirm the ancient belief that the Christian Bible is foretold in Jewish Scriptures.

The discovery of esoteric meanings in mechanically generated letter combinations shares much with ancient and medieval textual manipulations that originated as pious play and with now-discredited notions once sustained through studying the movements of the stars and the shapes of human skulls. Because it was associated with some scientifically accurate information, such thinking was often confused with science, but eventually more sophisticated study helped debunk it.

Time, money, and energy should not be wasted in attempts to reconfirm the past or predict the future and in casuistic rationalizations of why that future did not unfold as predicted in stars, in tea leaves, in palm lines, or in reconfigured Bible texts. We should discourage the search for allegedly encoded esoteric messages and press discussion of the exoteric ones, which, despite their visibility, are in danger of being lost. Their recovery and examination is a far more pressing need for our time.

Barry Levy is professor of Jewish studies at McGill University and dean of McGill's Faculty of Religious Studies.

Thinking about the past

By Emil Fackenheim in Germany

My three months of teaching as Franz Rosenzweig Professor at Kassel University are almost up, and I am ready to go back home to Israel. But if after three months in the country — I've been back for a few days a number of times but never this long — I should be able to give a report, I am embarrassed. I often feel "If everything is so good, why is it so bad" but I know why I feel that.

The people are amazingly friendly and relaxed, there isn't a trace of militarism, the campus is pretty international, there are foreign restaurants — it's all like a different country from what it used to be — so what is so bad? Everybody says "you can't claim Bach without also taking Himmler" or (in case of my hometown Halle) "you can't claim Handel without also taking Heydrich." I've said it myself many times. But on a day-by-day basis they don't take Himmler or Heydrich.

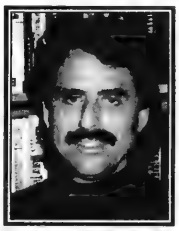
But this is, partly, just in my mind. For if, in my teaching, I every now and then get off my subject and break into what happened, it's clear that that's what they want to hear. Also, I have now been to various Jewish-Christian friendship groups, and am impressed with the slow, steady work they are doing, especially with the fact that it is steady. One theological friend told me that one always has to start all over again. I don't think they'll give up, and I admire their tenacity. And they try to deal with the past — including the Jewish-Christian past — honestly.

But the larger issue bothers me constantly: one can't "overcome" or "work through" the Holocaust: the catastrophe is too enormous, and we too act as if "we have survived, and now it's time to live again." At the same time, public awareness faces only now that among the "perpetrators" were also "ordinary men" who never murdered before, and that the Wehrmacht too engaged in war crimes; that the "bystanders" didn't just stand by but also stole the property of murdered Jews; and that the ultimate victims — to quote Primo Levi — the skin-and-bones Muselmaenner, who were already dead in spirit before they dropped dead — are also the complete witnesses.

This makes me think that whereas the experience is almost over, the time for thinking about it, trying to face and understand it is still too soon. But I am well aware that others think — perhaps hope — that it is too late for that too, and that what I more and more believe is a unique crime in the annals of mankind will eventually be forgotten. But we may never forget the victims.

The word I hear more often here than any other is "hope." I am told it is because of pessimism about unemployment and worry about the environment, but I wonder. Do they want to hear about hope from a Jew coming from Jerusalem?

RIP: Oslo peace process



By Martin Himel in Herzliya

It feels like the heart of the peace process stopped beating long ago. Presidents Bill Clinton and Hosni Mubarak, and Jordan's King Hussein have been giving ongoing heart massage and have been keeping the process on political life-support.

Maybe, however, it is time to listen to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Chairman Yasser Arafat. They have jointly declared the peace process dead. They should know. They have killed it.

The latest suicide bombing wasn't even the coup de grace. It merely stated the horrible, obvious fact — the Oslo peace process is dead.

Each leader has worked very hard at stabbing what was the resilient heart of the peace strategy. They used a number of elegant shabariyas (Middle Eastern knives).

Arafat's thrusts included giving the green light for on again and off again violence and protests. Another jab came from his allowing the radical Muslim Hamas and Islamic Jihad limited autonomy, basically looking the other way while they planned their bloody suicide attacks.

Instead of trying to heal the hurt organ by working with the unusual support he was receiving from the Clinton administration, Egypt and Jordan, Arafat gave in to his lack of patience and frustration, kicking with his intifadah-style actions and old-style guerrilla techniques.

He has proven too small for the task of making peace. Arafat took a bold step in entering the current peace process, but instead of giving his people real hope by harnessing solid international backing to improving their lives, he has returned the Palestinians to the false Messiahs of terrorism, bloodshed, hatred and violent struggle.

Arafat also played right into Netanyahu's hands and Netanyahu has achieved his declared goal. He has always come out against the Oslo accords and has effectively killed that process.

His sophisticated weapons included settlement expansion, endless delays in implementing the Oslo accords, carrying out only symbolic redeployments in the West Bank, opening a controversial tunnel in Jerusalem, imposing endless closures on Palestinian towns and villages.

Netanyahu has returned Israel to the good old pre-Rabin days. The country is isolated internationally. Enmity with the Arabs is growing. Tourism is dead. The economy is sluggish.

His slogan "peace with security" proved to be just what it was meant to be, a euphemism for "the re-ghettoization of the Jewish State." Unfortunately, most Israelis only feel secure when they are within historic ghetto boundaries, in this case fortified with guns and that "reassuring" wall of hatred from the outside.

We in the Middle East and in Israel are getting what we deserve. Israel voted in Netanyahu and therefore voted out the Oslo process. The Palestinians could not rise to the occasion and learn to relinquish their almost manic hatred of the Jewish State. Arab leaders have not shown the resolve to fight Islamic radicalism, one of the most lethal threats not only to the peace process, but also to their own regimes.

Radical Islamic leaders, Yigal Amir and Baruch Goldstein (in some other world) can all smile and shake each other's hands. They have succeeded for now. Netanyahu and Arafat will never prove to have the "guts" to be peacemakers.

We will have to wait patiently for other leaders and hope it won't cost too many lives to allow them to emerge, take over and give birth to a new peace process.

Having deep blues

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Everyone is at times subject to fits of dejection or depression It therefore comes as no surprise that the recent victory of IBM's Deep Blue over world chess champion Gary Kasparov has caused predictions of the coming victory of machines over humans. Television and newspaper columnist Charles Krauthammer recently published an article in the Weekly Standard (May 26), entitled: "Be afraid. Be very afraid."

In it he predicts that "it will take perhaps a few centuries more for computers to reach the final, terrifying point of self-awareness, contingency and autonomous free will."

I cannot predict what machines will do a few years from now — the fabulous advances of modern technology discourage this kind of prophecy. It is entirely possible that something resembling self-awareness will indeed be part of these machine creatures of the future, a kind of sophisticated feedback mechanism which now is only in its infant stages. But a machine still is, and will be, made by its human inventors. It will be programmed in the image of humans, but not in the image of God.

The Krauthammer article came to my attention when I received my bi-weekly edition of the Prager Perspective, a review of Jewish religious challenges by the widely renowned California TV commentator, Dennis Prager.

He is quite right when he says that Kasparov's defeat by the machine means nothing except that the big calculator (which Deep Blue is basically) has been greatly developed. It calculates millions of chess positions per second and many more different outcomes in three minutes. But then, even the smallest pocket calculator can figure out the square root of a large number in a fraction of a second, while poor mortals, using their brains, may take hours to achieve the same end. This has not moved us to consider the pocket calculator a threat to human superiority — but somehow Deep Blue has taken us by surprise. Prager debunks such reaction and he headlines one of its paragraphs "Deep Blue is a Moron:"

"Ask Deep Blue the capital of South Dakota or where the men's room is — not to mention how it feels about slavery — and it is no more than a giant paperweight. On the other hand, while Gary Kasparov may also not know the capital of South Dakota, he can sing songs, read novels, have original ideas about raising children, romance a woman, contemplate the wonders of nature and make moral choices. Not bad for a creature that weighs considerably less than Deep Blue and yet matches the big computer in the only thing it can do."

Why then (asks Prager) do so many people believe that Deep Blue's victory is so important? Because, he says, we confuse calculating intelligence with the essence of being human. Furthermore, Judaism has something to teach us in this regard. It teaches that free will and a sense of the religious are chief attributes of our humanity. For us, Deep Blue and its successors will arouse admiration, not so much for their capacity as for ours, which has used our God-given endowment to develop such a marvellous machine.

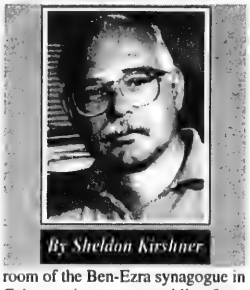
Cairo Geniza – a treasure trove of Judaica

One hundred years ago, a bookish Cambridge University scholar named Solomon Schechter sat in the store-



By Sheldon Kirshner

room of the Ben-Ezra synagogue in Cairo, poring over crumbling fragments written in Hebrew, Arabic and an assortment of other Middle Eastern languages in Hebrew characters.

Schechter, an authority in rabbinic literature, stumbled upon the Cairo Geniza — a treasure trove of documents that shed light on Jewish life and society in Egypt and the Mediterranean basin between the years 1000 and 1250 CE — thanks to the curiosity of two Scottish women.

In 1896, Margaret Gibson and Agnes Lewis acquired Geniza fragments during a sojourn in Cairo. Upon returning to Britain, they asked Schechter, a friend, to decipher them.

A keen student of Judaica, he was not oblivious to the significance of the Geniza. But when he realized that one of the fragments they had bought from an Egyptian antiquities dealer was an original copy of the Book of Wisdom, a tract of ancient Jewish proverbs, he decided to make haste to Cairo to examine the Geniza.

In Judaism, a geniza is a repository in a shul where worn-out prayer books are stored until they are buried. But in Cairo, all unwanted documents were dumped into the Geniza, a special vaulted room in the attic of the Ben-Ezra synagogue reachable only through a hole in the ceiling.

Consisting of long-forgotten letters, notes, business and marriage contracts, wills, family archives, religious manuscripts, liturgical poems and responsa, the Cairo Geniza is a window into a bygone era about which precious little was known. This is no small matter, since the vast majority of Jews during medieval times lived in Muslim domains.

The Geniza contains letters penned by Maimonides, notes taken by an anonymous rabbinical student, an interpretation of the Bible by a Karaite named Yusuf Ibn Nuah and almost two-thirds of a pre-Mishnaic tract called Sedar Olam.

As well, there are letters which offer insights into Yehuda Halevi, the Spanish Jewish poet; papers related to the fortunes and misfortunes of Abraham Ben Yiju, a Tunisian merchant who spent 18 years in India; and the the correspondence between a mother in Jerusalem and her son in Cairo.

Schechter, dumbfounded and amazed by this discovery, spent weeks in the synagogue. "The task," he wrote, "was by no means easy, the Geniza being very dark, and emitting clouds of dust when its contents were stirred..."

Somehow or other, he persuaded Cairo's Jewish community to let him transfer a good portion of the Geniza — some 140,000 documents — to Cambridge University, where they remain to this day.

This cache, however, comprises about half of the fragments in the Geniza. One hundred and twenty thousand other pages, not to mention entire manuscripts, found their way to libraries and private collections around the globe.

Long before Schechter appeared on the scene, a Russian Karaite, Abraham Firkowitch, obtained many Geniza documents. After his death in 1874, the State Public Library in St. Petersburg took possession of them. Later, the Bodleian Library at Oxford University amassed a large collection of Geniza manuscripts.

Remarkably enough, much of the Geniza remains inaccessible. One-third of its texts have been published, another one-third have been examined but await publication and the remainder have yet to be studied and cataloged.

The late S.D. Goitein (1900-1985) is arguably the greatest Geniza scholar of all times. His five-volume tome, A Mediterranean Society, is a masterpiece of historical research and synthesis.

This year being the centenary of Schechter's trip to Cairo, interest in the Geniza is running high. Tel Aviv University and the Hebrew University recently hosted an international conference on Geniza studies. And exhibitions, scheduled to end in October, have been mounted by the Israel Museum in Jerusalem and the Jewish Museum in New York City.

Jews fared better under Islamic rule

Until quite recently, the consensus among observers was that Jews fared better under Islam than Christianity.

This interpretation transcended the ages. In the 19th century, Henrich Gratz (History of the Jews) wrote: "Here [under Islam] the sons of Judah were free to raise their heads, and did not need to look about them with fear and humiliation." More recently, Andre Chouraqui commented: "The Jews of North Africa were happier than those in most parts of Europe..."

The Six Day War, which exacerbated Arab-Jewish tensions, virtually demolished this rosy view. A host of historians, ranging from Martin Gilbert to Bat Ye'or, debunked what they described as the myth of an interfaith utopia.

Mark Cohen, a Princeton University professor, delves into this debate with gusto in a scholarly book entitled Under Crescent and Cross (Princeton University Press, $29.95 US). The publisher claims that it's the first in-depth explanation of why medieval Islamic-Jewish relations, though hardly ideal, were less confrontational and violent than those between Jews and Christians in the West.

Cohen reaches his conclusion through a systematic comparsion of the status of Jews in Islam and Christendom. Space does not permit a thorough review of Cohen's thesis, which is cogent and persuasive, but following are highlights:

Mohammed, the founder of Islam, died a natural death and therefore, Muslims had no reason for holding Jews responsible for his passing. In Christianity, however, the circumstances of Jesus' demise fanned theological anti-Semitism.

Jews in Islamic and Christian lands labored under disabilities and restrictions, which Cohen lists at length. Yet the arbitrary taxes imposed on Jews by Islamic rulers were "a surer guarantee" of protection from hostility than in the West.

Islam's positive attitude toward trade, in contrast to Christianity's disdain for the merchant class, enabled Middle Eastern Jews to achieve a greater degree of integration than in Europe.

Minorities (dhimmis) in Islam were expected to remain "in their place." But at least they occupied an assured slot in Muslim society, Cohen notes. In Europe, the situation was not quite as stable.

European Jews were forced into ghettos. In Islam, residential separation of ethnic and religious groups was voluntary and normal, with no stigma attached.

There were periodic pogroms in the Islamic world, and some exacted immense casualties. Nevertheless, European Jews were subjected to physical violence on a more massive scale. And, Cohen adds, Jews in Islam did not suffer the anguish of expulsion.

You may not agree with all of Cohen's arguments, but you will certainly be impressed with his scholarship.

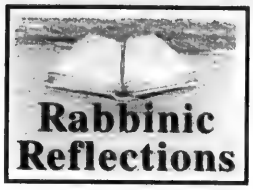
The adventure in Jewish learning
It's as easy as one, two, free



The way of wonder

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

About to visit the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, one student in study for conversion to Judaism asked, "Has the Shoah changed our attitude to Pesach?"

It was an insightful question, because a major message of the Exodus is, simply put, I was a slave in Egypt, and had I been there, I would have been redeemed. So I learn of God's greatness and the mitzvot that derive from the experience of slavery — to have one law for the native and the stranger, to open our hand to the alien in our midst and the downtrodden among us.

Jacob Neusner points out that, after the Shoah, many Jews are saying, had I been there, in occupied Europe, I would not have been redeemed. So I learn of God's impotence and our own need to make sure that no human beings can ever impose their ungodly will upon the Jewish people again. It's a lonely message, an angry message, but one that relates well to the facts of our age.

Is there a counter-message? Perhaps this week's parshah, Vaetchanan, proposes a different conclusion, one that may provide less anger and equal inspiration.

In referring to the Exodus, Moses says, has anything as grand as this ever happened or has its like ever been known? (Dvarim 4:32). Is this chutzpah on Moses' part or is he correct in his assessment?

For those who contemplate the horrors along the path to freedom, Moses' words are audacious, indeed. For 40 years, the Israelites trekked through the wilderness, facing daunting challenges. Amalek would murder their young, their weak, their elderly. The earth would swallow the dissatisfied and rebellious among them. Fire would consume those who simply brought the wrong kind of sacrifice. An entire generation would die along the way. How dare Moses say, "Has anything as grand as this ever happened?" The Exodus catalogues four decades of misery.

From what angle, then, is Moses looking that he can speak such upbeat words? The Torah teaches here what Abraham Joshua Heschel called "the way of wonder." The way of wonder begins with an appreciation of what is, not with an assessment of what was. We do not deny the past. We learn from it. But we come to this moment prepared to find its goodness and to stand in awe of its power and possibility, especially given our knowledge of the past.

In the face of the Shoah, we do not deny the evil, and we do, as Neusner suggests, draw lessons from it. But we also stand at this moment in wonder before a people gathered from every quarter of the earth to inhabit Eretz Yisrael and to speak leshon hakodesh, Hebrew. Yes, we know our past. We take its message into our soul. But then we live in this moment. We recognize that to be alive at this instant in the history of the people of Israel is a privilege, a joy, an inspiration.

"Has anything as grand as this ever happened or has its like ever been known?" Plucked from one fire and forged by others, some might say we Jews are scarred and burned. The way of wonder proclaims that, despite all the tragedy, at this instant there is a miracle: we have been tempered and case-hardened to withstand whatever difficulties may come our way.

FORCED EXIT
by Wesley J. Smith
RANDOM HOUSE $35.

In the near future the U.S. Supreme Court will rule on whether there is a constitutional right to physician-assisted suicide. This has long been a vexatious and troubling problem, and there are religious leaders, politicians, doctors, ethicists and lawyers on both sides of the question.

Proponents maintain that every individual has the right to make what has been called, "the most intimate choice central to personal dignity and autonomy." This would include exercising some control over the time and manner of one's death. The question is asked, "Why should patients in the final phase of terminal disease have to suffer needlessly?"

Actually, argue those in favor of assisted suicide, this is already a widespread medical practice. A recent study in the State of Washington revealed that 25 percent of physicians provide lethal prescriptions for terminal patients requesting them. There were similar findings elsewhere. In San Francisco, for example, 53 percent of 1995 responding physicians said that they had granted an AIDS patient's request for suicide assistance at least twice. These statistics approach the rate at which doctors help patients die in Holland where assisted suicide is, in effect, legal.

Addressing euthanasia

The author of this hard-hitting book, a lawyer and consumer advocate, reveals the disturbing social ills and damages inherent in the euthanasia movement. Through original reporting, exhaustive research, scores of true stories and extensive interviews with doctors, ethicists and activists, he makes a compelling case against euthanasia. At the same time he indicates some of the humane and compassionate alternatives — hospice care for the dying, more effective pain control and independent living for the disabled.

He always maintains a balance between sane, well-grounded observation and deeply felt passion. Assisted suicide, he warns, can become an accepted form of controlling health care costs. The wealthy will stay alive because they can afford medical resources. On the other hand, poor people, the disabled, the helpless with chronic health conditions will become the most likely victims of a vicious and heartless course of action.

Jews of various denominations, split as they are on most other issues, appear to express general opposition to euthanasia. In making decisions about the dying there are two principles in conflict: life is sacred and the relief of suffering. This delicate balance is often hard to maintain, but all Jewish religious teachers agree that heroic measures to prolong life — or the death process — are unnecessary and even unseemly.

Smith reminds us that between the years 1939 and 1945, German doctors and nurses intentionally killed more than 200,000 helpless people: the cognitively or physically disabled, people with mental disease, infants born with birth defects, the senile elderly, even the severely wounded German soldiers. These euthanasia practices were the first movement of the symphony of slaughter that took the lives of millions of Jews and other "undesirables," whose deaths we memorialize in the term Holocaust.

Euthanasia led directly to the death camps of Auschwitz, Treblinka and Dachau, as, in the words of the psychiatrist and Holocaust historian Robert Jay Lifton, "the medicalization of killing" became "a crucial…terrible step [toward] systemic genocide."

Maurice Lamm, president of the National Institute for Jewish Hospice and chair of professional rabbinics at Yeshiva University, writes, "The answer to the desperation of dying lies in compassion and courage and understanding, and even hope in 'hopeless' circumstances. Not suicide. Kevorkian is wrong, dead wrong, even if the circumstances of some individual's dying are horrendous in the extreme. The 'sweet death' of hemlock is a denial of life and all it embraces. Hemlock is not a Jewish flower."

Dealing with death

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, we continue our look at a difficult but important topic, death, and related Jewish resources on the Internet.

One of the most recognized prayers in Jewish liturgy isn't written in Hebrew but Aramaic. There are many Internet sites that examine Kaddish and its role in remembering the dead. For a straight translation see [http://www1.mhv.net/~mgraffam/rel/kabbalah/siddur/kaddish.html] and for a detailed analysis, go to [http://www.chabad.org/gopher/guide/kaddish.txt.htm].

But the Kaddish prayer has also been adapted into many artistic forms to express both personal and collective grief. In Kaddish, poet Allen Ginsberg remembers his mother and the horrible years she spent battling psychotic episodes [http://www.charm.net/~brooklyn/Poems/Kaddish.html].

Another Kaddish was written by Avraham Burg, chair of the Jewish Agency, after the deaths of 73 soldiers in the IDF helicopter crash in February [http://www.ja-wzo.org.il/struct/chair.htm]:

"Our children took off for a five minute flight and soon they'll touch down in the Garden of Eden.
No one will be there at the landing pad to clean off the blood, to wipe away their tears..."

The Kaddish Foundation [http://mnemotrix. master.com/kaddish/] is a non-profit organization based in Cleveland Heights, Ohio. It will retain individuals to say Kaddish and Yizkor for specified amounts of time. Check out their Web site for a clear explanation of Kaddish and other memorial rituals such as Yizkor [http://mnemotrix.master.com/kaddish/terms.html#yizkor].

Finally, after all the rituals have been completed, there are still the memories. In Of Time and Debbie, [http://www.jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/article.asp?ArticleID=250] Shira Dicker reflects on the impact the death of a classmate still has on her 30 years later. "The truth of the matter is that time is a healer only for some. For others, time is an executioner, snatching them out of a perfect present for reasons unfathomable to us and known only to G-d."

With the mourning of Tisha b'Av behind us and the joyous holiday of Tu b'Av shortly ahead, [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/tubav/] may G-d comfort all mourners, spare us from grief and may we know only simchas.

Honoring heroes

This ceremony holds great personal meaning for me, not only as a representative of the State of Israel, but also because I was a hidden child during the war. It is through the unsung heroism of people such as the Vis family, whom we honor here today, that traces of humanity were salvaged during those barbaric years.

The Holocaust was the most extensive and systematic state-engineered genocide in the annals of human history, an event of unprecedented evil.

All at once, it seemed that human decency and respect for life disintegrated. Primal brutality, pathological hatred, systematic indoctrination and propaganda all converged to trigger an orgy of mass murder unsurpassed in its calculation and cunning. The Holocaust proved the fragility of Jewish existence in the Diaspora and ended the illusion that the Jewish people could survive without a homeland of their own.

We came here today to remember and to bear witness: to remember the Holocaust and to bear witness to heroism and survival; to remember the insanity of the Nazis and to bear witness to our determination to persevere.

But we have also come here to honor one of the heroes of the Second World War, Mr. Roelof Vis.

Only a few courageous individuals, who Israel recognizes as "Righteous Among the Nations," defied the barbarous laws of the Nazis. At great personal risk, often armed only with their morality, these brave souls helped save Jewish lives while the majority turned a blind eye to the atrocities.

Mr. Vis is an exemplary representative of the Dutch Resistance in the years of World War II. When I asked him what influenced him as a young boy to join the Resistance, he told me that it had been a maxim from the Bible that was on the wall of his parents' home:"Hide the outcasts, betray not the wanderer."

This sentiment influenced not only Roelof Vis, but also many other people in his small, deeply religious village, De Knipe, which is in the northeast region of the Netherlands. During the war, 31 Jews were hidden in De Knipe; three times as many as the average in the rest of the country.

Mr. Vis, one of nine children, started working at age 13 in a shoe store. There, at age 17, he first learned about the Resistance. The owner of the store, Mr. Steenwijk, was involved in the Resistance, but shortly after young Roelof began to help, Mr. Steenwijk was arrested. The next day, Mrs. Steenwijk asked Vis to help locate some safe houses where people could hide from the Nazis. Over time, Roelof Vis helped transport many people, including young children, to safety.

It is in recognition of such selfless efforts that the Medal of the Righteous Among Nations is issued by Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority in Jerusalem.

This tribute is the highest expression of gratitude that the State of Israel can offer. The medal is inscribed: "Whoever saves one life, it is as though he has saved the entire world."

Mr. Vis told me that "after the war, some people boasted about what they had done. But the real Resistance fighters didn't act in order to receive any honors."

I am glad, nonetheless, that Mr. Vis has agreed to accept this well-deserved honor.

Bar mitzvah on Masada a magical moment

LESLIE G. KINRYS
CJN Staff

Guest Voices

It's 6 a.m. The sky is brightening and the desert air is still cool. Our four families are climbing the Roman ramp to reach the top of Masada, where we are going to celebrate our children's bar and bat mitzvahs.

We've all met for the first time on this trip. Our tour itinerary is a mix of history and adventurous fun. We are strangers, yet quickly friends, who are now about to share an intimate, emotional, family milestone.

The children are excited by the early hour and the adventure of the climb. But when we arrive at the top and the tour guide takes charge, you can see them thinking, "More history, more ruins to see!" Everyone is impatient for the rabbi to start the davening.

Finally, we're assembled in the Western Palace at the top of the mountain. The rabbi involves everyone in the Shacharit service. Two younger sisters help take the small Torah out of the backpack used to carry it up.

Our son has the first aliyah. His voice is as sweet as it was at his formal bar mitzvah in February. I try to focus the camera for a picture; it's so hard when you are wiping tears from your eyes. I wish my parents could have made this trip, to be here now. I see so many of the same emotions playing across the other parents' faces. All our children are so sure of their Torah portions and suddenly they seem so grown up.

Two older sisters get later aliyot. My husband raises the Torah as the hagbah and one of the other mothers has the honor of galilah. Two of the fathers are trying to capture as much as they can on video. The service is almost over. It has gone as quickly as the one in February.

The rabbi has the two boys and two girls stand under a tallit held by four of the parents. We bless our children. The rabbi addresses them and wishes them a life of Torah, good deeds and the wedding canopy, like the one they're now standing under. We throw candies at them, raise a cup of grape juice and dance in their honor.

It's now well past 9 a.m. The sun is strong and the day is going to be a scorcher. The last of the explorations of Masada seem anti-climactic. We're ready to leave. It's time to enjoy the rest of the trip and hope there are more family vacations before our children don't want to travel with us anymore.

Advt.

It was fun to appear Tuesday afternoon as a clown to entertain the "munchie" kids at Camp Robin Hood. They do so much to integrate the disabled...and what an honour to perform some of my magic tricks in front of the one and only Mark Zeifman, "Magic Mark". Get him to perform his mystifying and dazzling illusions at your birthday party. I'll even show up...for a donation to Reena. He's at the camp for the summer. Did you know that Sam Kolber (famous photographer) is a clown, part of the "Sambrian" group, doers of good deeds?

I enjoyed seeing Baycrest's Elaine Todres, Charlie Diamond and Harold Lederman at United Bakers Dairy Restaurant, and my Reena buddy Dave Kelman, my Shaare Zedek pal Harvey Solursh, Carol & Herman Gottesman and David Goldstein. Speaking of Baycrest, Harvey was on my first Wheat Sheaf Tavern sponsored Baycrest Fun Run team. Our photo is always on my desk!!!

Wonderful to see Dr. Sheldon Nadal (who pioneered minimum incision, painless bunion removal) at the Reena Gala Dinner honouring his brother, Miles. What a spectacular celebration!!! We reminisced about our volleyball playing days together.

I'll bet you can't believe I got through a whole column without mentioning Sheila B. Engel.

SEE YOU BACK HERE IN OCTOBER...AND ELSEWHERE!!!

This is Jerry Borins' last column as Capital Campaign Director for Reena's Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre. We wish to thank Jerry for his contribution to the Reena Foundation during the past 15 months in helping Reena move towards its goal. The Centre will officially open on September 7th and will enable Reena to extend its programs to meet the needs of people with developmental handicaps in the community. We wish Jerry good luck as he embarks on exciting new challenges.

Jabotinsky's yahrzeit marked

By REVA KAISER
Student Intern

TORONTO — Ze'ev Jabotinsky, renowned for his writings and Zionist activities, may have died over 50 years ago, but his messages and dreams are still very much alive.

A service in commemoration of his 57th yahrzeit was held last Wednesday, organized by Herut-Likud, Betar-Tagar and Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation (BAYT).

Keynote speaker Dr. Eliyahu Ben-Elissar, the Israeli ambassador to the United States, said Jabotinsky was one of the first Zionist leaders to understand that acquiring independence and sovereignty for the Jewish people in a Jewish state would not be without struggle, since it was unrealistic to expect the Arabs to simply hand over their land.

Flanked by Israeli and Canadian flags, and with a poster-sized photo of a young Jabotinsky in military attire behind him, Ben-Elissar spoke to a gathering of about 300, emphasizing how alive Jabotinsky's ideals still are, and what an important influence Jabotinsky has been to him.

There is much to learn from Jabotinsky, especially pertaining to the present situation in Israel, the ambassador said.

"I often ask myself this question: Had Jabotinsky lived to see these days, what would he be doing?"

The problem that we face, said Ben-Elissar, is the reality of the Oslo agreement. "If we could have in Israel a situation where we were not facing an Oslo reality, it would have been by far preferable."

Ben-Elissar was among the 59 Knesset members who voted against the Oslo accord and narrowly lost to the majority of 61. He still opposes it, but said because of its existence, it must be taken into consideration.

"Our [game plan] today consists of trying to establish a way of living together with Palestinian Arabs." Today, Israel cannot be considered "occupiers," and the Arabs must govern themselves, he said.

U.S. peace mediator Dennis Ross will be returning to the Middle East to ensure that Arafat and the Palestinian Authority (PA) will pursue the policy of applied law and order, as well as the dismantling of Hamas, he said.

"We'll give this negotiation a chance," said Ben-Elissar. "We have to trust the Israeli government to do all it can – and even more – to create a new situation between us and the PA without jeopardizing authority."

Applause broke out when the ambassador said that Jerusalem will not be redivided. It will remain forever Israel's capital city, he said, with the backing of the U.S. government, which speaks of "settlements" in the West Bank, but refers to Har Choma as a "housing project" — because it is in Jerusalem, which has a different status.

"I'm proud to be able to approach the celebration of the 50th anniversary of Israel, in spite of all this [terrorism and lack of peace]." What a difference there is between the Israel of today and 1948. We've accomplished so much, Ben-Elissar said, "who could've dreamt?"

Off-beat stories a masterful collection

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — A writer who has staked out his literary territory somewhere between Franz Kafka and Edgar Allen Poe, Norman Ravvin is the author of Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish, a masterful new collection of short stories recently published by paperplates books of Toronto.

Ravvin recently told me how he had come to write each of the seven stories in the book — stories that are comic, off-beat, ironic, absurdist, modernist and frequently evocative of a vanished Jewish world.

Several present the immigrant's point of view, bizarrely juxtaposing two cultures.

Consider, for example, Doomed Cinema, a tale about two New York agents eager to buy a historic movie theatre in Colorado. To close the deal, the story's Canadian protagonist, whose family owns the dilapidated property, goes off in search of his crazed cousin, Mark Harris, who has signing rights over it.

An amnesiac, Harris turns up in a New Orleans hospital. His roommate, a dying native who is the last of his tribe, has been teaching him the dead language which is the only one that Harris now speaks.

In Glendale, North of Alhambra, East of Burbank, the first-person narrator travels from western Canada to Los Angeles to arrange the funeral and settle the estate of F, his late great-aunt. F had supported herself, at least in part, through a legalistic scam "in which she went into a store, pulled some piece of stock down on herself, and then cut a wicked settlement in lieu of a lawsuit."

Even in death, F is surrounded by litigious possibilities. The doctors at the hospital where she died won't admit that her life-support machine had come unplugged during an earthquake and her bed had rolled across the room "like an out-of-control chuckwagon."

But the narrator doesn't particularly care, recalling that F tried to prevent the posting of a money order to his grandmother, stuck in wartime Europe in "1935 or thereabouts. One of those nasty, ominous years. If F had gotten her hands on the mail that day, I probably wouldn't exist."

Norman Ravvin

From his great-aunt's last effects, he takes only a picture of his infant mother, consigning the rest to the trash.

"I'm a real lover of mysteries and puzzles that won't resolve," Ravvin explained. "My characters often find themselves trapped in mazes that sometimes have to do with family life and sometimes have to do with who they are. The mazes do not have escape routes and the mysteries do not resolve.

"I also like to deal with the question of cultural crossing: what it means to move from one world to another, and how some of us, because of our pasts, feel that we're caught between one world and another. Some of my younger characters especially are really trapped; the maze that they're caught in is figuring out how they relate to their parents' world, which is often the world of Europe before the war.

"Some of the older characters are in search of some unrecoverable past — sometimes it's a European past — or some aspect of Jewish life that they feel has somehow gone missing from their daily lives. It's the same element that makes so many people go back in search of their ancestral homes."

In the hauntingly ironic story A Jew's House, a Pole living in a house that once belonged to a Jewish family encounters an American on the street who is seeking his parents' former home.

Although the Pole knows he is living in the house in question, he pretends ignorance and the seeker leaves dejectedly. Seen from the Pole's hostile perspective, the American Jew seems little more than a weak, nostalgic fool.

"I am describing a predicament, or a position, about which I have some sensitivity," Ravvin said. "It has to do with being contemporary and relevant, and the need to contend with Jewish history and the European cultures of our parents. I try to map the gap between then and now, between there and here. I like that stretch. I like to move within those limits."

Both of Ravvin's parents immigrated to Canada from Eastern Europe in the 1920s; his father ran a furniture store in Calgary. Born in Calgary some 34 years ago, Ravvin attended the local Peretz school where he strengthened his knowledge of Yiddish.

His first novel, Cafe des Westens, published when he was just 27, focuses on four generations of the Jewish Binder family.

A second novel, as yet unpublished, is a mystery set in Vancouver called Fat Tuesday.

Ravvin is an admirer of authors Leonard Cohen, Mordecai Richler and others who have successfully transmuted the Jewish-Canadian experience into literature. "I'm also a big lover of the American beat poets like [Jack] Kerouac, and I really enjoy Allen Ginsberg's poetry – that willingness to really scream and shout."

Ravvin, and other authors, will be reading at the Ashkenaz Festival at Harbour Front Brigantine Room Aug.31 at 3:30 p.m. Phone 416-703-6892. His book is available at many bookstores around Toronto for $12, or directly from paperplate books, 19 Kenwood Ave. Toronto M6C 2R8.

Born to brunch bikers love the open road

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As comic Jackie Mason quips, Jews don't hunt. Or fish. He might add they don't ride big, bad motorcycles either. Leather jackets? Harley-Davidsons? What would our mothers say?

But this isn't a "born to be wild" crowd. Rather, the 125 members of Yidden on Wheels (YOW) pride themselves on being trendsetters. As Canada's first and only Jewish motorcycle club (not gang, as members stress repeatedly), "Yowies" emphasize safety, love of bikes (not hogs) and having good, clean, legal fun. Their mothers would approve.

"Jews do it, and do it in a big way," says YOW co-founder Bob Brodie. "We don't hide the fact that we're Jewish. It's just that we've been hidden. We're proud of who we are."

Indeed, club members sport large colorful crests on their leathers (worn for safety) depicting a big stylized chai with a bike being driven through it.

Brodie, a 51-year-old social worker who now works in leasing, founded YOW two summers ago along with three other motorcycle enthusiasts, to reach out to Jewish riders who may have felt out of place in other clubs, especially if anti-Semitism was an issue.

"With us, you can feel comfortable," he says. "We kibbitz around. We have fun. And we like to eat."

That explains why members meet each Sunday morning and chow down on hearty breakfasts before heading out on the open road. But before they do, announcements are made that may concern the latest charity effort in which the club is involved, or perhaps details of a shivah for a member's loved one.

Then it's time to hit the road. Members split up into groups of six or seven to cruise the highways of Ontario, each with a leader and someone at the rear to make sure everything is kosher. There are also regular Wednesday night rides, and longer excursions are always being planned. Yowies regularly trek to motorcycle rallies and shows, proudly wearing their chai emblems.

Brodie and other Yowies take great pains to dispel the biker image. These are no beer-guzzling, tattooed outlaws, but lawyers, accountants, stockbrokers and business people. One member is a cantor at a large Metro synagogue. Another is a judge in upstate New York. It's a touring club, they say.

And the rules are strict: positively no drinking or drugs. Members are encouraged to take safety courses (most have). There's a monthly newsletter (The Maven), a written constitution and just in case you doubted this is a Jewish organization, in-house legal counsel.

"We welcome non-Jews," Brodie says. (There are about nine non-Jewish Yowies). "And we promote women as members." Children are welcome too. Everyone must be fully helmeted, booted and long-panted.

Brodie, a burly Israeli army veteran, maintains just a whiff of biker rebellion. Raised in an Orthodox home, he became interested in motorcycles "because my parents said I couldn't."

Over nine months in 1980, he biked around the world. Recently in Winnipeg, he took his 92-year-old mother out for a little spin.

Although Harleys are welcome, the club doesn't discriminate among brands. Bikes range from a 1961 BMW to the monster 1,500-cc, liquid-cooled, fully-loaded Honda Gold Wing dream machine, which retails for about $30,000.

Yowies acknowledge that not everyone appreciates their passion for motorcycles. Says YOW ride coordinator and Metro lawyer Morris Cooper: "You drive a car. You ride a motorcycle."

Asked about the appeal, Brodie shuts his eyes and slowly shakes his head. "I can explain it, but a non-rider just wouldn't understand. The exhilaration..." His voice trails off.

But it's not all open roads. Driven by a strong sense of community, members have done some impressive charitable work, including helping the Out of the Cold program for the homeless in Toronto and working for Jewish Family & Child Service's battered women's shelter. They also take part in the annual Ride for Sight.

There are Yowies in Israel, and interest in forming chapters has come from Winnipeg, Montreal and several points in the United States.

Members even have a signature call. "All we have to say is: 'Yowie, Yowie, Yowie'. We watch out for each other."

U of T student graduates with Yiddish major

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Marc Kates

TORONTO — As an elementary school student, Marc Kates was probably the only kid to take a Yiddish-English dictionary to Camp Northland.

Now 21, the Thornhill resident recently became the first student to graduate from the University of Toronto with a major in Yiddish studies.

A mameloshon enthusiast since his early days at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Kates didn't set out to major in Yiddish. With U of T offering only four courses in the subject, majoring in Yiddish didn't even appear to be an option.

But following a year's study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 1995-96, during which Kates took additional Yiddish courses, a U of T faculty member told him he had enough courses to create a major.

"It was a wonderful, unexpected gift," said Kates, who graduated with a double major, earning an honors BA in Political Science as well.

With a facility in languages – he also speaks Hebrew and French, and picked up a smattering of Arabic in Israel – he is interested on the effect Yiddish has had on English, and vice versa. Words like shpiel and even bopkes have been heard on major radio stations, he noted.

In addition to being a very expressive language, Yiddish is a way of perpetuating Jewish heritage, Kates believes. "Some words you just can't say in any other [language] — even simple words like shlep. A nosh has to be something sweet. A "snack" just doesn't cut it."

In an article that appeared in the Jewish student newspaper Images in 1994, Kates described a memorable nosh – one in which his Yiddish played a key role.

On a pre-Shabbat bakery outing, Kates, then seven, thanked a Yiddish-speaking server – in Yiddish – for a cookie. Suddenly he found himself surrounded by servers, each offering a different nosh.

"It was then that I realized I was on to something good," he wrote.

On a more serious note, he credits his first two Yiddish teachers at Bialik, Henia Reinhartz and Ana Berman, for nurturing his love of Yiddish.

Using the aforementioned dictionary, he corresponded with Reinhartz from summer camp.

Once he reached Grade 6, Kates and his mother Bonnie, a fourth-generation Canadian, were among those to lobby for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) to include Yiddish in its curriculum.

Kates took a Grade 11 Yiddish course through the North York Board of Education while attending CHAT, and it wasn't long before he starting teaching small Yiddish classes for younger students, at their request.

Now, in addition to sitting on the program committee of Friends of Yiddish and UJA Federation's committee for Yiddish, Kates teaches two adult classes run by the UJA Federation's committee for Yiddish and the Workmen's Circle of Toronto.

Kates' first adult class was located at Bialik. "That was an interesting feeling, a wonderful feeling," he recalls.

He loves teaching, incorporating songs and stories into his lessons, and hopes his students will leave class with an appreciation for Yiddish and a desire to continue studying.

Whatever Kates does in the future, he "definitely" wants to continue his involvement with Yiddish.

Jewish war orphans plan 50th anniversary reunion

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A group of Winnipeg Jewish war orphans — survivors of the Holocaust — are planning a reunion next May to celebrate the 50th anniversary of their arrival in this city.

Reunion organizers Barbara Goszer, Frank Weinfeld and Mickey Hoch were part of a group of 1,000 teenage war orphans the Canadian government permitted to immigrate to Canada after the war.

The orphans, were brought to Canada by the Canadian Jewish Congress from displaced persons camps. The first group to be settled in Winnipeg came in September, 1947, and orphans continued to arrive in small groups until the early 1950s.

Over the years, most were successful in building new lives, though many moved away from Winnipeg to do so.

In 1972, some of those still in Winnipeg decided to organize a 25th anniversary reunion of their arrival. It was so successful that the Winnipeggers decided to form a group called ANAV (which stands for Help Youth Forever in Hebrew) in commemoration.

"We applied for a charitable number and raised money for local causes and for Israel," says Weinfeld.

After that, they held reunions every five years, but after the last one — the 45th — they felt it was time to disband ANAV because members were too busy with other matters and many went south for the winter.

They turned their remaining monies over to the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba with the interest earned directed to helping educate needy Jewish children.

Currently, Barbara Goszer notes, a number of former ANAV members are involved in the Holocaust Awareness Committee of Winnipeg and are raising money to help fund their dream of a Holocaust Education Centre, which is currently coming true. The centre will become part of the Jewish Museum of Western Canada at the new Asper Jewish Community Campus.

The 50th anniversary reunion is scheduled for May 15 to 17, 1998.

Friday evening, out-of-town guests will dine at private homes, following which will be a coffee party and opportunity to renew old acquaintances. The formal Saturday evening program at the Glendale Club will include dinner, dancing and a presentation of plaques to honorees who have worked to spread the message of the Holocaust. Sunday morning, the group will tour the Holocaust Centre and partake in a farewell brunch.

The organizers would like to hear from former Winnipeggers who were among the war orphans. Contact Frank Weinfeld at 204-339-3390.

Tunisian cemetery in disrepair

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Michèle Bismuth Blitt felt very bitter when she revisited, for the third time since 1989, the Jewish cemetery of Le Borgel, on the outskirts of Tunis. It was in such a state of decay that Bismuth Blitt had difficulty in finding her mother's grave.

"It was very painful. I had not visited the country of my birth for about 25 years and I was desolated when I realized that one of the principal vestiges of Jewish Tunisian memory is falling into such disrepair. In my opinion, to let this cemetery die is to implicitly endorse the decline of a marvellous historical-cultural heritage that is thousands of years old," said Bismuth Blitt, a Montreal Sephardi who has lived in Canada since the late '50s.

Bismuth Blitt has approached several international Jewish authorities, as well as the government of Tunisia, to have the Le Borgel Jewish cemetery restored.

"I am launching this appeal in memory of my dear mother and of my fellow Tunisian Jews. We must save our past, because it is the cornerstone of our identity. Without the preservation of that identity, our future will be threatened," said Bismuth Blitt, her voice thick with emotion.

Tunisian Jews have inherited a rich historical, cultural and religious heritage. As the French historian Jean-Pierre Allai says in his photographic collection that recalls the glorious past of the Jews of Tunisia, Les Juifs de Tunisie. Images de Mémoires, the vitality of Tunisian Judaism contributed greatly to the development of Sephardi culture.

The Jewish presence in Tunisia dates back many centuries. Jewish lamps made of baked clay and decorated with menorahs, dating back to the second century, were discovered at the end of the last century. A Jewish cemetery dating from the fourth century was excavated in 1833 in a Tunisian town. In 1880, French archeologists discovered a synagogue dating from the fifth century, decorated with sumptuous mosaics.

Tunisian Judaism is made up of three branches: the Jews who had to flee Eretz Yisrael after the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem; the Berber branch made up of local tribes who, over the centuries, adopted Judaism; and later, an Italo-Spanish branch, primarily consisting of Portuguese Jews, natives of Livorno who were persecuted by the Inquisition.

In 1881, at the beginning of the French protectorate, the Jewish community of Tunisia numbered about 40,000. On the eve of independence in 1956, some 120,000 Jews lived in the country. Today, the Jewish community has only a few hundred people left.

Bismuth Blitt hopes to raise awareness in Jewish Sephardi communities.

"There are not many Jews of Tunisian origin living in Canada," she says. "Nevertheless, I am counting on the support and involvement of the members of the Sephardi community here."

Bismuth Blitt said the Tunisian government has been receptive to her request.

For more information about the Jewish cemetery, Le Borgel, call Bismuth Blitt at 514-932-1274.

New secular Jewish school set to open

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The 4-year-old Sholem Aleichem Cultural Group has taken a step forward with the establishment of its first Sunday school program.

The new school will open on the third Sunday in September at the new Asper Jewish Community Centre. The enrolment thus far is 24 students ranging in age from five to 13.

In keeping with the Sholem Aleichem School that flourished briefly in Winnipeg in the 1920s, the new school's emphasis will be on secular Judaism. For the first hour, the students will be divided into three different levels according to age and taught stories from the Torah and Jewish history. For the second hour, all the children will come together to learn Jewish songs and dances in a club format.

"The older children will have the option of working toward a secular bar or bat mitzvah," says David Robinson, the group's co-ordinator. "Each child will spend a year working on a personal project of a Jewish nature assisted by an adult mentor. When the student is ready, he or she will present it to the community."

Currently the Sholem Aleichem community consists of about 50 member families and individuals numbering about 150. An outgrowth of the long-standing United Jewish Peoples Order, the Sholem Aleichem Group appeals to secular Jews – from all parts of the city – who appreciate the opportunity to celebrate Jewish family-oriented holidays – such as Chanukah, Purim and Pesach – with like-minded people.

Robinson reports that Jewish secular movement schools have a long history in Toronto and Vancouver and are wide spread in the United States.

Chicken soup and Chinese medicine

BY LORI EPPSTEIN
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

SAN FRANCISCO — Jewish mothers have long believed that the best medicine for a head cold is rest, fluids and steaming hot chicken soup.

But when it comes to PMS, chronic fatigue and HIV-related diarrhea and anemia, Jewish folk medicine stops where Chinese medicine begins, says healer Misha Cohen of San Francisco's Chicken Soup Chinese Medicine clinic.

Chinese medicine includes acupuncture, massage, instruction on proper nutrition, meditation, herb therapy and other Eastern practices that can improve vitality and ward off disease.

Maybe that's why Cohen parted ways with her Jewish upbringing — at least when it came to medicine — while seeking a cure for her own mystery disease more than 25 years ago.

It was 1969 and Cohen was caught up in the turmoil of civil rights protests and sleepless nights of study at Oberlin College. Her diet was typical of that of most college students — sweets, pizza and dorm food. It wasn't long before Cohen had a breakdown.

The doctors thought it was mononucleosis, then appendicitis. They operated and found it was mono, after all. Definitely, they said.

It was chronic fatigue syndrome, Cohen later learned, though it didn't have a name until the 1980s.

Not wishing to repeat the experience, the biopsychology student became a vegetarian and began to learn about herbs and natural food therapy.

The seed for a more wholesome lifestyle had actually been planted earlier by her Jewish grandmother — a practising Jew, fruitarian and yoga teacher. Cohen fondly recalls the soaked black mission figs and dried millet breakfasts, though the sorghum was less than a hit.

The years following her decision to lead a healthier lifestyle lured Cohen to become involved with the politics of health care. She started a women's health newspaper in 1970 and subsequently discovered natural healing.

By the time she enrolled in her first Chinese medicine class, where teachers engaged students in a talmudic-style discourse of medical texts, she says she felt: "This is where I'm supposed to be."

Cohen, who now holds a doctorate in Oriental medicine and is a state-certified acupuncturist, has since discovered further similarities between Jewish practice and Chinese medicine.

"When I go to China and I tell them I'm Jewish, they get very excited and say we have a lot in common. I think, 'What are you talking about?'

"They are talking about a quest for education and knowledge," she says. "Their way of Chinese medical study is very similar [with regard to] the questioning of the sages. One of the ancient Chinese medical books is a series of questions and interpretations of the Yellow Emperor," who, as legend has it, first promoted acupuncture and healing arts in China during the third millennium, BCE.

When it comes to earth-based medicine, Chinese medicine leaves Jewish folk medicine in the dust, so to speak. Chinese farmers planted the same land for generations and charted lunar patterns for the best times to harvest herbs while Jews wandered the Diaspora.

"[Jews] haven't had a chance to develop the same earth-based system," Cohen says.

But Jews and Western doctors of today are making up for lost time. More than ever, they are now incorporating Eastern philosophy into their practices.

Cohen released her first book, The Chinese Way to Healing, last fall, and is working on another about treating HIV.

Security issue dominates renewed diplomacy

By JAY BUSHINSKY and JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — U.S. peace envoy Dennis Ross shuttled between Jerusalem and Ramallah last Sunday, conferring twice each with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat.

The security issue dominated these discussions, in keeping with Ross' mandate from President Bill Clinton and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

This approach was welcomed by senior Israeli officials, but they expressed fear that Palestinian pressure to expand the agenda might dilute the Ross mission.

As the United States reactivated its diplomatic campaign to resuscitate the sagging peace process, the European Union's peacemaker, Miguel Moratinos, prepared to resume his contacts with Israeli and Palestinian leaders. The Spanish diplomat was expected to confer with Foreign Minister David Levy before seeing PA officials.

Netanyahu's session with Ross was attended by cabinet secretary Dan Naveh, policy adviser Uzi Arad, and legal counsel Yitzhak Molcho.

Netanyahu reportedly told Ross that Israel places supreme importance on the war against terrorism and the continuation of the peace process and stressed that the country wants to see results.

There were indications that Israeli and Palestinian security officials were intensifying their clandestine contacts in the presence and with the input of American counterparts, presumably Central Intelligence Agency personnel.

But a senior government aide rejected the idea that high-level meetings are a way out of the current crisis. "If that is their answer to security, then they are completely wrong."

He said Netanyahu wants the PA to arrest and imprison persons involved in the West Bank-Gaza Strip terrorist infrastructure and views the extradition of Palestinians accused of murder here as much more meaningful than conclaves, discussions and photo opportunities.

Although a mini-summit would be "a tiny step forward," the aide said, "it is no substitute for the effective exchange of intelligence information leading to the capture of terrorists."

In a statement to reporters immediately after his first session with Netanyahu, Ross said Clinton and Albright "are committed to doing all they can to help get the parties back together again."

He said Clinton and Albright "want me to focus on the security questions."

Government officials expressed "annoyance" at Arafat for allegedly engaging in a disinformation campaign inimical to Israel's national interests. They denied that Israeli agents informed Arafat that the Jerusalem suicide bombers had come from outside the country. Also untrue, they said, was Arafat's remark that the Hebron Agreement required American participation in its supervisory body.

Ross, in his meeting with the PA delegation, disappointed them by focusing only only on security coordination, but left open the possibility of political discussions once that is resolved.

Arafat said in a Channel 1 interview that, far from the Palestinians breaking off security coordination, Israel had called off U.S. involvement in security talks three weeks before the Machane Yehuda bombing.

That claim was denied by Dan Naveh, who said that in any case it did not absolve the PA of responsibility for fighting terrorism.

Albright talks tough to Arafat

By MATTHEW DORF
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — The United States will back Israel's suspension of political talks with the Palestinians until they clamp down on terrorism.

Analysis

This was the message U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright delivered in her first speech on the Middle East as America's top diplomat.

"It is simply not possible to address political issues seriously in a climate of intimidation and terror," Albright said at the National Press Club here last week.

At the same time, the policy does not signal smooth sailing for Israel.

Albright also hinted that if and when Israeli-Palestinian talks resume, the United States would back the Palestinian demand to halt Israeli building in eastern Jerusalem and the West Bank.

"The principle of refraining from unhelpful unilateral acts is central to maintaining mutual confidence," she said.

"It is fair to ask: How can you create a credible environment for negotiation when actions are being taken that seem to predetermine the outcome?"

But Albright directed the bulk of her hastily arranged policy address at Yasser Arafat and his Palestinian Authority, warning that a total crackdown on terrorists and renewed security cooperation with Israel must come before the United States would support reconvening long-stalled peace talks.

"There is no place in the peace process for violence or terror, and there is no room for using security cooperation as leverage in a negotiation," said Albright.

The political situation has taken on a new urgency in the wake of the suicide bombing in a Jerusalem market that claimed 13 Israeli victims.

Albright offered to travel to the Middle East later this month to work at accelerated final-status talks if Arafat makes "a 100 percent effort" against terrorism.

In referring to final-status talks, Albright suggested that it would be easier for the parties to overcome setbacks and avoid distraction if the Interim Agreement is "married" to accelerated final-status talks.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has suggested moving right to final-status talks, which are supposed to address the issues of borders, settlements, refugees and Jerusalem.

Hezbollah attack kills soldier

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — An IDF soldier was killed and another wounded during intense Hezbollah rocket and mortar fire on the village of Rehan north of Marjayoun on Sunday, in continued escalation of fighting in south Lebanon.

The clash sparked fears of imminent widespread battles in south Lebanon, and Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri met with Syrian President Hafez Assad to discuss the situation. Over the past week, 14 Lebanese and one Israeli have died in the fighting, the highest toll since Operation Grapes of Wrath in April 1996.

IDF sources said that if Hezbollah continues its indiscriminate shelling, the understandings reached after Grapes of Wrath will disintegrate. They maintained that the current offensive is being coordinated and encouraged by Iran.

Hezbollah, in a communique issued in Beirut, said its fighters rained machine-gun fire and rocket propelled grenades on an IDF patrol in the area of Mleikh, south of Jezzine, in the security zone. Lebanese security sources said an IDF motorized patrol was in the village of Rehan at about 4:15 p.m.

In response, IDF artillery shelled Kafr Houneh and other areas in the highlands of Iqlim al-Tuffah in the central region of the security zone, which are regarded as Hezbollah infiltration routes. No casualties were reported.

The fighting continued into the night as air force jets bombed and strafed suspected Hezbollah hideouts north of the security zone.

IDF sources said Hezbollah had grossly violated the U.S.-brokered understandings reached after Operation Grapes of Wrath, in which all sides pledged not to target civilians. Both Israeli and Lebanese representatives had been discussing each other's alleged violations in the committee monitoring the cease-fire in Nakoura when the IDF casualties were reported.

A stream of attacks began when a mine exploded near a truck in Marqaba inside the security zone, about 500 meters from the Israeli-Lebanese border. IDF sources said nobody was wounded and IDF gunners retaliated by shelling Hezbollah hideouts.

Hours later, two women were hurt when a shell hit the S.O.S. Village orphanage in Sfarai in the Jezzine area. The IDF Spokesman said the injuries were caused by a direct hit of one of eight Katyusha rockets that landed around the home. The orphanage was evacuated and the children and supervisors were taken to Beirut.

Hariri agreed. "Arafat declares on one side 'peace' and his men shell on the other side," he said after his meeting with Assad. "This is dangerous."

IDF sources said Hezbollah has embarked on what appears to be a new policy of denying Katyusha attacks on civilian targets. Last Friday, Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah denied that his organization fired the rockets that landed in Kiryat Shmona, in which one woman was hurt by flying glass.

"I've already made some friends and had a lot of fun!"
"WOW! What a beautiful and diverse place!"
"I no longer feel so isolated in a small town."

Hamas, PA said to cooperate in terror

goal, like that of the defendants in the trial of the World Trade Centre bombing which began this week, is to eliminate what the terrorists regard as the enemies of Islam.

"Today, there is no point in talking about Hamas terrorism," a senior security source says. "It's the Palestinian Authority [PA] that has allowed Hamas to maintain an infrastructure for terrorism that involves training, funding, religious indoctrination and plenty of guns and explosives. And, it's all under the nose of the PA in Gaza."

Indeed, U.S. law enforcement documents obtained by the Jerusalem Post describe a strong link between Palestinians in the West Bank and Jordan, some of whom are known Fatah moderates, and terrorist leaders of Hamas and Islamic Jihad. According to the documents, the coordination involved transfer of funds, orders and ways to bring Islamic terrorists into the United States.

Israeli security officials say cooperation between Hamas and Fatah — the leading group in the PLO, headed by Yasser Arafat — began in early 1993, in the wake of the Israeli deportation of 415 Hamas and Islamic Jihad activists to south Lebanon. The deportation led to an ad-hoc agreement among all of the armed groups in Gaza to cooperate in attacks against Israel.

The officials say the cooperation between Hamas and Fatah gunmen continued even as the political dialogue between the movements foundered over the question of supporting negotiations with Israel.

In a recently released study on Hamas by Tel Aviv University's Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace Research, authors Shaul Mishal and Avraham Sela say the PA has become one of the most conciliatory of Arab regimes toward the Islamic opposition.

By August 1996, the PA had stopped even the pretense of cracking down on Hamas. Arafat began to release hard-core Islamic terrorists, and ignoring the protests of Israeli officials, he even included some of the released men in the Palestinian security forces. Today, there are several dozen Hamas members in PA jails, down from more than 1,000 in early 1996.

With the breakdown of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, even high-profile PA spokespersons have acknowledged that Hamas no longer feels the need to act against Arafat's interests.

Today, Arafat is said to believe he no longer feels a need to ban terrorism. As a result, he has quietly allowed Hamas to reorganize and resume attacks, although continuing to insist that the organization not take credit. According to Jordanian sources, Arafat even met secretly with Hamas leader Mousa Abu Marzouk in Amman to discuss Palestinian strategy, as tension with Israel continued.

The Palestinians compare the Machane Yehuda bombers to Hussein Makded, the Lebanese Shi'ite who blew himself up in the Lawrence Hotel in eastern Jerusalem in April 1996 while preparing the bomb he wanted to place in a Jerusalem shopping mall. Makded entered the country with a stolen British passport in the name of Andrew Newman, and investigators believe his Iranian handlers intended that the PA be blamed for the bombing.

But Israeli security sources argue that even if the two Machane Yehuda bombers came from abroad, they, like Makded, were certainly given assistance by local Palestinians.

Palestinians have contradicted each other in explaining the Machane Yehuda bombing. Islamic Jihad sources say the bombers were local Palestinians. A report in the Hamas-operated Quds Press Agency, said in a dispatch from Nicosia last week the bombers were Hamas members who came from Lebanon's Ein Hilwe refugee camp, an assertion disputed by PLO commander Munir Makdah there. They said the bombers were 21 and 22 years old.

The biographies of the bombers in the Quds Press Agency report match the assertion of Israeli security sources who say Fatah and Hamas militants cross easily into each other's organizations. Hamas sources say the bombers were members of Fatah and joined Hamas early this year. The Quds Press Agency report said the two were trained in a Hamas base in the West Bank and arrived in Israel via an unidentified Arab state.

Israeli security sources are exploring a similar possibility. Their scenario is that the bombers were trained in a Fatah camp in Sudan and then brought in via the illegal tunnels dug by Palestinians that connect the Gaza town of Rafah to the Egyptian Sinai.

Some 15 tunnels have been destroyed by Israel, the latest, officials say, after security officials discovered that they were being used to smuggle in terrorists and such weapons as anti-tank and anti-aircraft missiles.

In contrast to their Israeli counterparts in the Machane Yehuda episode, U.S. authorities were lucky. An anti-terrorist task force raided a Brooklyn apartment where two Palestinians and an Egyptian were about to place bombs in crowded places around New York City.

Israeli investigators are in the United States inspecting the bombs prepared by the terrorist squad to check for similarities to those used in attacks in Israel. At the same time, FBI investigators are in Israel being briefed on any Middle East connection to the Brooklyn cell.

A senior government source says the assessment is that Hamas was behind the Brooklyn plot.

Israeli and U.S. investigators, however, appear to agree on one thing: Palestinian terrorists are determined to continue their strikes in both countries.

Paper alleges holocaust planned

devour them in the night and these sheep will be the innocent Arabs and Jews and that is the coming Holocaust which will exceed the first by its ugliness."

Two weeks later, an editorial appeared in the June 18 edition of Al-Miraat that attacked David Sultan, director of community relations of the Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region. The CJN's April 10 article quoted Sultan as describing the Al-Miraat article as "hate literature" and "plain anti-Semitism," and said that Congress would seek a meeting with the paper's editor to request an apology. Failing that, he said, Congress could lay a complaint with the Quebec press council.

Ignoring the article that Sultan was referring to, the Al-Miraat editorial said Sultan was complaining about a poem that focused on Israel's shelling of Kana in Lebanon and it suggested Canadian organizations should seek dialogue to resolve their problems.

Jack Jedwab, executive director of Congress' Quebec region, said Congress had called Saadi Al-Malih, Al-Miraat's editor, on several occasions but had not received a return call.

He said Congress is seeking a legal opinion to determine whether the articles could be considered hate literature or whether there are grounds to complain to the Canadian Human Rights Commission. Jedwab said a complaint to the press council is not an option since the body doesn't have any meaningful enforcement mechanisms.

The June 18 editorial, he said, "avoids the issue that disturbs us. It is an attempt to transform the issue into one involving the Middle East. But what clearly bothered us is that the [March 5] article was clearly vitriolic, anti-Semitism."

Jedwab said that despite Al-Malih's editorial that calls for dialogue, Congress' calls over the course of weeks had not been returned. Instead, "we received their response through the paper, through what they've written."

Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for Congress, said discussing the article with the paper's editor would be the preferable way to proceed. Earlier this year, Congress took its concerns regarding an arguably anti-Semitic article that appeared in the Toronto-based newspaper Al-Orouba to the publication's editor and an apology eventually appeared in print.

Meanwhile, Sasson Mayer, the individual who translated the articles and brought them to the attention of Congress and The CJN, said he has seen the level of rhetoric in local Arab-language papers increase over the years. Where once they criticized Israel and then Zionism, they have broadened their verbal attacks to include the Jewish people.

Sasson's concerns over the content of some Arab papers are valid, Farber said. "There are seriously anti-Semitic articles."

But he said the Quebec region is following the correct procedure in addressing those concerns. Without the cooperation of the newspaper's publisher, pursuing the legal route is "a complicated and protracted procedure."

He downplayed suggestions the rhetoric could escalate into violence, saying there is no Canadian precedent for that.

After three phone calls, a woman who identified herself as Al-Miraat's manager called The CJN to say Al-Malih would only answer written questions.

Maccabiah bridge collapse claims fourth victim

By JONATHAN TEPPERMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Warren Zines, the Australian athlete who lapsed into critical condition last week following injuries sustained in the Maccabiah bridge collapse, died Sunday, raising the death toll from the July 14 accident to four.

His death intensifies the debate over pollution in the Yarkon River, into which Zines and his teammates fell when the bridge collapsed.

Zines, 56, was a member of the Australian lawn bowling team. He died of a severe respiratory-tract infection, according to Sheba Hospital spokesperson Rachel Sofer.

His wife Lynne, daughter Lisa, and son Adam were at his bedside.

His condition had improved a day after his admission but it deteriorated soon after, and he went into a coma from severe respiratory insufficiency. Doctors said the high bacterial count in the Yarkon water that he inhaled made it impossible to stabilize his condition.

His body was transferred to the Institute of Forensic Medicine at Abu Kabir for an autopsy.

"We deeply regret there is yet another death in this terrible episode," said Australian Ambassador Ian Wilcox.

While there is still no medical evidence that contaminants in the Yarkon contributed to the four deaths, Wilcox said that he had urged Israel to speed up the tests it is conducting.

"It looks as though [Zines'] death is linked to toxins in the water. It was clearly not just a drowning," said Wilcox.

Two of the four athletes were killed immediately when the footbridge carrying the Australian athletes across the river collapsed. A third died subsequently of lung and kidney complications that hospital officials attributed to pesticides in the water.

Arafat's moment of truth

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

In the aftermath of last month's suicide bombing in Jerusalem, Yasser Arafat faces a defining moment of truth.

Is he prepared, finally, to deal seriously with the spectre of Islamic fundamentalist terrorism? Is he ready to resume full security cooperation with Israel?

Mideast Analysis

These are not new questions. They have been asked with increasing urgency since Hamas and Islamic Jihad — which oppose the peace process and Israel's very existence — launched a wave of unprecedented terrorism in Israeli cities three years ago, following Baruch Goldstein's murderous rampage in Hebron.

Until recently, after each suicide bombing, Arafat, president of the Palestine Authority (PA), condemned the perpetrators, arrested Islamic militants in the Palestinian autonomous areas and promised to combat terrorism.

But since Israel's decision last March to build a Jewish neighborhood in eastern Jerusalem's Har Choma district, a unilateral act which largely caused the breakdown of peace talks, Arafat has modified his response to terrorism.

He denounced suicide bombings on March 21 in Tel Aviv, which claimed the lives of three women, and on July 30 in Jerusalem, which left 14 Israelis dead. But in a departure with past pronouncements, he and his officials now assert that there cannot be security cooperation without political coordination.

In practice, this means that the PA will not meet Israeli demands with respect to a war against terrorism unless Israel stops the Har Choma housing project and the expansion of settlements in the territories.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who has accused Arafat of encouraging violence and compared him to Saddam Hussein, wants the PA to hand over Palestinians accused of killing Israelis, to arrest Islamic activists released from prison and to smash the terrorists' infrastructure.

To coax Arafat into complying with its wishes, the Israeli government has suspended peace negotiations, sealed off the territories and cut off the flow of taxes and customs duties upon which the PA is vitally dependent.

But Israel's crackdown, which Arafat has described as a "criminal measure" aimed at starving the Palestinians, has not had the desired effect. So far, in keeping with his post-Har Choma policy, Arafat has not taken any meaningful steps to confront Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Last week, he dug in his heels still deeper, declaring that he would not bow to Israeli dictates.

Arafat's defiance is related to his loss of trust in Netanyahu. He believes that his implict understanding with the previous Labor party government over the implementation of the Oslo accords has crumbled since Netanyahu's accession to power.

In exchange for territorial withdrawals which would enable the PA to exercise self-determination in much of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, Arafat pledged to keep terrorism under control. With Netanyahu, however, the rules of the game have changed. Since his government is ambivalent about Oslo, claims at least half of the West Bank and is philosophically against a sovereign Palestinian state, Arafat feels that he has no compelling incentive to crush the terrorists.

Yet, when the Labor party governed Israel, Arafat failed to uphold his side of the bargain: Yitzhak Rabin was plagued by terrorism, as was Shimon Peres, who lost the 1996 election after four suicide bombings.

Arafat's lax posture toward terrorism also stems from his carrot-and-stick attitude toward Hamas and Islamic Jihad. He has both fought and tried to co-op Palestinian rejectionists. But his strategy, which is underpinned by a fear of a bloody Palestinian civil war, has not worked. As a result, he finds himself under intense pressure from Netanyahu and U.S. special envoy Dennis Ross to root out the terrorist threat once and for all.

If Arafat values peace, he can no longer postpone the day of reckoning with the enemies of peace in his midst.

Aug. 4

• Israeli media reported that Jonathan Pollard had cancelled a visit with an Israeli Embassy official after Israel's justice minister suggested he be transferred to an Israeli jail. Pollard said he did not want the visit "while the government of Israel is stabbing me in the back." Pollard, sentenced to life imprisonment in 1987 for espionage on behalf of Israel, was granted Israeli citizenship last July.

Aug. 5

• Israel rejected a request from U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross to resume reimbursing monies it pays the Palestinian Authority (PA), which account for two-thirds of its revenue.

Aug. 6

• Israel announced it will arrest PA police chief al-Jabali if he crosses the border between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. He is suspected of having organized the Palestinian police officers who were arrested for intending to murder a rabbi.

Aug. 7

• Protests continued against an Israeli High Court of Justice ruling upholding the appointment of a Reform movement representative to Netanya's religious council. Orthodox chief rabbis met to discuss the ramifications, and senior Religious Affairs Ministry officials vowed to fight the ruling.

• Israel expressed satisfaction with U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's remarks that the United States will back Israel's suspension of political talks with the Palestinians until they clamp down on terrorism.

Aug. 8

• A story in Ha'aretz based on government figures claimed that only one-third of all Soviet Jews who immigrated to Israel in the past two years are Jewish. The report was criticized by Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg, who said it "borders on racism," since the Law of Return extends Jewish rights to those with any Jewish relative.

Swiss Jewish leaders get death threats

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZURICH — Several Swiss Jewish leaders were placed under police protection last weekend after receiving death threats in the mail.

Among those receiving the threats was Sigi Feigel, honorary president of the Jewish community of Zurich, who was seen escorted by two policemen as he walked along the city's streets.

Other Jewish communal leaders have received death threats, but they have sought to downplay the situation in an effort not to draw attention to themselves.

In a separate development, a band of neo-Nazis disrupted a celebration marking the 149th anniversary of the creation of the Swiss Confederation that was held last week at Ruetlj, located near Lucerne.

They gave Nazi salutes and shouted Nazi slogans, but police at the scene did not attempt to intervene.

"We did not want to over-react," said Reto Habermacher, a local police commander.

Habermacher said the group was very small and admitted that police had not sought to get their names.

Jewish leaders questioned why the police did not act as they are required to do under Switzerland's anti-racism law.

"This incident shows that a lot of people in this country do not have the political will to act in accordance with the law," said Thomas Lyssy, vice-president of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Switzerland.

Another anti-Semitic incident occurred last weekend in Arosa, a resort located 100 miles north of Zurich.

Rabbi Abraham Pinter, principal of a 1,000-student yeshivah in England, had booked a vacation apartment in Arosa for himself and his family. The reservation was confirmed by fax, but the landlord later contacted them to find out if they were Jewish.

When Rabbi Pinter's wife told them that they were, the landlord said, "We are not renting to Jews."

The office's director, Urs Eberhardt, apologized for the incident and offered another apartment in Arosa free of charge.

The family, however, turned down the offer, not wanting to be exposed to any additional anti-Semitism there, Eberhardt said in a telephone interview.

Instead, Eberhardt said, they accepted an invitation to Montana-Crans, a resort in the French part of Switzerland, for a two-week vacation.

Lyssy expressed satisfaction with the way the problem was resolved. "This is not the first time that such an incident happened in Switzerland, but it is the first time that Swiss officials reacted so quickly and generously," he said.

Ashkenaz Yiddish festival promises top-level dramas

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Raise the curtain, dim the houselights! The most amazing collection of Jewish theatre in the history of this comunity is coming to Ashkenaz: A Festival of New Yiddish Culture at Harbourfront from Aug. 25 to Sept. 1.

The festival includes the North American premiere of The Dybbuk, written by S. Anski and performed by the Teatr Wierszalin company (Bialystok, Poland); the Toronto premiere of The Last Yiddish Poet, presented by the Traveling Jewish Theatre (TJT) of San Francisco; the world premiere of The Memoirs of Gluckel of Hameln, produced by the avant garde Great Small Works of New York; and On The Air, a musical performed by Kapelye, one of America's best known Yiddish klezmer bands.

For parents who want their children to experience a classic Jewish play, The Dybbuk, (Aug. 25 to 28) about the demonic possession of a living person, is a good choice.

Teatr Wierszalin, a non-Jewish company of four actors, uses roughhewn wooden figures as props in this play. The Dybbuk was acclaimed at Scotland's Edinburgh Festival and this Toronto apperance is the start of a North American tour. In Toronto there will be three shows in English and one in Polish.

Though it depicts a long-ago time in Jewish life, this powerful drama still remains alive today because it deals with human issues, and good triumphing over evil.

The Last Yiddish Poet (Aug. 30, 8 p.m. and Aug. 31, 3 p.m.) is as fresh as today's news, even though it was written 20 years ago. The play is produced by Corey Fisher, Albert Greenberg and Naomi Newman, the founders of the TJT.

With a few props and a nearly bare stage, this San Francisco troupe performs true theatre of the mind, the creme de la creme of Jewish theatre for the thinking person.

The Last Yiddish Poet draws on texts from Peretz Markish who was executed by Stalin in 1952; Jacob Glatstein, a modern American Yiddish poet; songs by Itzik Manger and Mordechai Gebertig; and the

Mossad tale an espionage classic

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts editor

When I was a teenager I was a big fan of spy-novelist Robert Ludlum, until a friend told me if I wanted to read a real spy thriller to read The House on Garibaldi Street by former Mossad chief Isser Harel.

The book is the account of the undercover operation to identify, locate and spirit Adolf Eichmann out of Argentina to Israel to stand trial. Eichmann was the top Gestapo officer in Nazi Germany and one of the architects of the "Final Solution."

When I first read it, I thought it was better than anything Ludlum ever wrote. That feeling hasn't changed after re-reading it now 16 years later. A new edition has just been published by Frank Cass Ltd. as part of its Classics of Espionage series.

This edition has been revised by Harel and contains three new elements. The real names of all the intelligence operatives have been revealed; the official Israeli governmental approval for the mission is set out in its political context; and the revelation of the official involvement of the West German government in the operation.

This true-life account is as much a page-turner as any work of fiction. It is written in explicit detail but without going over the heads of anyone not familiar with special operations. (And how many of us really are?)

It chronicles all the frustrations the players had to go through to attain their goal, from renting cars that always broke down, to renting safe-houses that only seemed to come with unwanted servants and gardeners, to trying to persuade El Al to organize a special flight out of Argentina (never an easy task at the best of times); and the tedious and uncomfortable chore of staking out Eichmann at his home in Buenos Aires days on end. In the end though the weeks of planning bears fruit as Eichmann is safely captured and secretly flown to Israel. (Surely I didn't ruin the ending for anybody!) Eichmann became the only person executed in Israel's history.

The House on Garibaldi Street, with a new introduction by Israeli scholar and intelligence expert Shlomo Spiro, is distributed by International Specialized Book Services Inc.

Sign-making brothers are back in business

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sign makers Sam and Jack Markle are finding the light at the end of their tunnel is coming from a neon marquee glowing "tzedakah."

Known as The Markle Brothers Ltd., the graphic arts duo, originally from Winnipeg, has been considered worldwide leaders in advancing the art and technology of sign design and construction.

Over a 42-year career, their work in signage has become integrated into the character of Toronto's streetscapes. The neon flashing record they constructed for Sam The Record Man has become an icon of downtown life, their experience in electronics was consulted by the creators of the Honest Ed's marquee. Uptown, Markle handiwork is seen by mail goers at the Promenade and Centerpoint.

The Markles revitalized neon as a commercial advertising medium, founded the world's first electronic art gallery and even helped to pioneer the use of humor in advertising.

But despite impressive credentials, the Markham-based business found the 1990s a period of struggle and uncertainty. Ontario's recession years saw competition increase in their industry, while mainstay customers in commercial building and architecture became scarce. In April, the brothers were forced into bankruptcy, leaving a number of unfinished projects and outstanding commitments.

Yet the Markles have found great loyalty amongst customers. In a chance meeting with a prestigious client, Jack Markle received a six figure cheque to give the brothers a fresh start. Within a 10 day span, the brothers went from bankruptcy to a rejuvenated business operation.

"What happened was a miracle and it came when we least expected it," says Jack Markle. "The act of tzedakah by him [our client] has given us a new lease on life and restored our faith in humanity."

"This support is the reason why we are back in business," says Sam Markle. "We learned early on that if you value clients, they will value you."

Jack says the loan provided by their benefactor (who wishes to remain anonymous) allowed them to complete the remaining work under their former business, including sign work for Chabad Lubavitch Synagogue, which had made a deposit immediately prior to the bankruptcy.

Like a neon phoenix from the ashes, the Markles have started anew. Beginning the turnaround with a name change to The Brothers Markle Inc., the business has become a leaner venture in order to match the opportunities of the times. The brothers are now concentrating on creative design and manufacturing of signs, as well as computerized building directories. Many of their old clientele have welcomed back the brothers with orders, while new ones are discovering them.

Paralleling their work across Toronto, the mark of Markle can be found in virtually every institute and synagogue in the Jewish community. The Lipa Green Building, Aish HaTorah in Thornhill, Baycrest, the Associated Hebrew Schools, the Reena Foundation, Bialik Day School, and Bathurst Jewish Centre are amongst the many organizations in the community who have had sign work done by the brothers over the years.

"We didn't grow up here, but we found an acceptance in this community," Sam says. "Many of our relationships with the Jewish organization grew out of a handshake and into a synergy over four decades. I cherish the fact that we've built such strong ties with so many of our faith in Toronto."

writings of early 19th century mystics who were among the first to use Yiddish as a language of poetry and narrative.

The Memoirs of Gluckel of Hameln (Aug. 31 at 8 p.m. and Sept. 1 at 4 p.m.) is for those who want to see Jewish drama at the cutting edge. Alternating between humor and terror, the play uses a surreal blend of talmudic interpretation, medieval Jewish legend, news flashes and hardcore mercantile theory to describe the precariousness of life in 17th century Germany.

Its producer, Great Small Works, has been active in experimental theatre in New York for many years and its principals include Jenny Romaine, Frank London and Adrienne Cooper, one of the stars of Ashkenaz 1995.

In this adaptation of the story of the legendary German-Jewish woman of Hameln, multi-media techniques are used. The rest of the world will be waiting to hear about the Toronto debut of this state-of-the-art production.

The diversity, enthusiasm and inventiveness of Yiddish radio is the inspiration for On The Air (Af Der Luft), a production about Jewish radio shows and how they mirrored the life of our immigrant parents in the '20s, '30s and '40s. The talented vocalist, Adrienne Cooper, a member of Kapelye, shines in their production on Aug. 28.

פון אריאל קאָפּראָוו

Eight Engagements In Eight Months Singles Registry Leads The Way

"Our busiest year just got even busier" reports Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto Owner and Director Rob Singer. "Thus far 1997 has not only been a banner year for new registrants but also in the number of engagements that the Registry is proud to be responsible for. We've had EIGHT engagements in the last eight months alone. At this point we can safely say that we are averaging an engagement every four weeks, a goal that we have been working on since the Registry's inception nearly five years ago.

The Registry concept of letting members select for themselves their own dates by reading profiles, seeing photographs and hearing voice messages has taken Toronto Jewish singles by storm. It is the only service of its kind in Toronto and more than 1,400 people have already signed up.

It's a fast, fun and simple way for Jewish singles to connect with one another. Joining the Registry has many advantages and one of them is professional and courteous office staff. In addition to Singer, who has operated the service for five years now, two other representatives make up the team. Add on long office hours and six days a week accessibility and the JEWISH SINGLES REGISTRY offers Toronto Jewish singles a combination that is tough to beat.

READY FOR THE 21st CENTURY

While other dating services come and go, the Registry is preparing for the 21st century. Their new state of the art computer system is already a big hit with members. Using their membership number, along with a private pass code, members can easily log onto the system and access hundreds of files with a simple touch of a button. Each member profile contains a biography to read, a photograph to see, and something new, even to Registry members themselves; a unique option in which individuals can listen to voice personal messages. Registry members have all the details needed to make informed and quality dating choices. The new computer system is just the beginning reports Singer. Many new and exciting additions are in the works. Keep reading The Canadian Jewish News for further updates.

The Jewish Singles Registry knows how difficult it is to meet interesting people. Your job takes up a lot of time, bar hopping is not your scene, and while the classifieds are great for selling cars, they are not ideal for "steering" you towards an ideal partner. By registering with The Jewish Singles Registry you will be putting HUNDREDS of eligible Jewish singles at your fingertips and you will have the opportunity to go out with people that you want to go out with. Why spend another Saturday night alone when the Registry may have someone right for you? Call them today at (416) 483-4151. or E-mail jsreg@total.net.

KISS BLIND DATING GOOD-BYE

The Jewish Singles Registry offers you an unlimited number of introductions, that you select from an extensive Bio/Photo/Voice library. It's a great way for you to connect with people you would normally never get a chance to meet. So if you are looking for an attractive, fun, and simple way to meet other Jewish Singles, call the Jewish Singles Registry today.

Spa combats cellulite with new body-contouring technique

As our focus on health, well-being and "the shape we're in" increases, we're bombarded with choices by the print and broadcast media. Sifting through the literally hundreds of diets, exercise routines and facilities can be a daunting task for even the most informed consumer; determining what's right for us often requires extensive research.

Research, as it happens, is the cornerstone of a revolutionary new body-shaping technique pioneered in France and recently introduced to Canada. Spa Elancé, a sparkling new facility on Eglinton west of Bathurst, is the only spa in Toronto currently offering Endermologie™, a medically supervised procedure clinically tested and proven effective in reducing cellulite.

The procedure involves an extensive full body mechanical "kneading" massage, using a powerful suction-and-roller mechanism which stimulates circulation by making blood and oxygen flow massively in the suffocated tissues. The devitalized areas respond by becoming firmer and more supple, often within a few weeks.

Regular exercise and proper diet are prerequisites to any successful fat reduction program, notes owner/consultant Anne Vandette. Unlike "normal" fatty tissue, however, cellulite deposits cannot be reduced by exercise and diet alone because they stem from hormonal changes and heredity, among other factors. For example, many slender women — even professional athletes — have cellulite despite the fact that they exercise regularly and follow a strict diet.

Spa Elancé carefully screens applicants to ensure they're medically fit and able to derive maximum benefit from the treatments. "If the patient is more than 25 pounds over her ideal weight, says Vandette, "we advise her to lose the weight prior to commencing treatment."

Spa Elancé assists clients in their quest for firmer, more supple skin by separating cellulite fact from fiction

Similarly, women with high blood pressure are required to reduce it to an acceptable level before undertaking the program.

Each patient's progress is monitored by photos taken before, during and after the sessions. Though visible improvement is usually apparent after 5 or 6 sessions, Vandette emphasizes that Endermologie™ is not a miracle cure, and cautions anyone seeking a quick fix. "The shape you're in didn't develop overnight, and you're not going to change it overnight," she says. "But with a little dedication and patience, you can achieve results that were impossible before Endermologie™."

In keeping with its medical/scientific orientation, Spa Elancé employs licensed practitioners, each with an extensive background in the treatments and procedures they administer. The Endermologie™ treatments are performed by certified Endermologists, while a medical technician administers collagen treatments, facial peels and lip augmentation, among other facial and body treatments. Dr. Lisa Bujouves, a dermatologist, runs an acne clinic as well as treating patients for spider veins on the face. She emphasizes the fact that what may be a minor problem to some is a devastation to others. "No matter how minor the problem is," she says, "that patient is concerned enough to come and see me about it, so it's up to me to do what I can to help her or him."

Refreshingly, Spa Elancé promotes long-term well-being as opposed to the pampering enticements so common in this industry. Short-term solutions, Vandette says, merely mask the problems patients are trying to address. "A day package with a free lunch is all well and good," she says, "but it only makes you feel like new for a few hours. We invite patients to create a new them they'll feel good about not only today, but also tomorrow, next week, and for years to come."

Breathtaking!" "Magnificent!" These two words are frequently being spoken across Toronto as simcha goers experience the new magic of Shaarei Shomayim's banquet facilities.

"The room has surpassed everyone's expectations," says Les Firestone, owner of Sam Firestone Caterers. And the rave reviews to date indicate that it truly has. The splendid new facility brings together the popular shul's traditional haymishe feeling and the elegance of Firestone's catered events.

A visit to the newly renovated facility attests to the success with which designer Nurit Bloomberg has effected this transformation. In a word, it's stunning. The design is neoclassical with distinct architectural details. Decorative mouldings, a delicately latticed drop grid ceiling, maple panelling, columns and unique paint finishes give the room a warm, rich, natural glow. The window treatments feature an exquisite combination of sheers and swags, enhanced by soft indirect lighting. The omnipresent use of graceful, elliptical shapes ties the room together effortlessly. This is not glitter and glitz, but something far better, more refined — a compelling visual statement worthy of Ms. Bloomberg's international reputation.

The banquet hall seats parties of up to 400 with room for dancing. For auditorium-style functions, seating can be arranged for up to 650 people. Standing functions can accommodate about 1,000 people. Additional rooms are available for a wide range of functions.

Consistent first class cuisine has made the Firestone name legendary over nearly four decades of synagogue catering. Under the direction of Executive Chef Jimmy Lyras, Sam Firestone Caterers has earned an enviable reputation for unsurpassed quality and excellence in all the menus they serve. Les points out that his staff enjoys creating and preparing authentic regional dishes. "I know," he says, "that when my staff promises a dish, whether it be Moroccan, Italian, Chinese, or even Greek, it will have an authentic taste — as if it came directly from that region. I take great pride in this authenticity, and people know they can count on us for it."

Unequalled service is another term synonymous with the Firestone name. Les stresses his availability and dedication to clients. "I am always available to address any questions or concerns. The people I deal with know they can come to me at any time, and I will help them to the absolute best of my ability. My only concern is making your simcha perfect. The size of the party and the synagogue affiliation have absolutely no effect on my service. Whether your function is large or small, nothing gets in the way because nothing but perfection matters. And our prices are competitive."

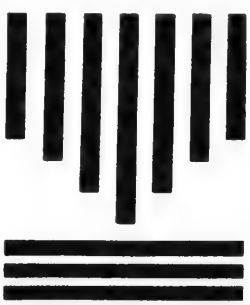
Another Les Firestone trademark is that he is always the last to leave. "After the consultants, the orchestra, the guests and the family have left, I turn off the lights and lock the door. At that point, when I reflect on all of the planning which went into the simcha, I always remember how much I love this business."

Having spent most of his life in the food service industry, Les affirms that there is no greater pleasure than hosting weddings, bar mitzvahs, and the other milestones in people's lives. "I know of no other business that gives you the opportunity to share in people's happiness each and every day," he smiles. In the newly renovated premises, Firestone simply has a more compelling setting in which to share that joy with members and non-members alike. His smile grows as once again, Les looks around Shaarei Shomayim's new room admiringly. "I hope people realize that there is nothing better than a shul simcha. A party will truly benefit from the special relationship that develops between a shul and its caterer over the years. Our combined expertise makes for unbeatable service and attention to even the smallest detail."

Firestone and Shaarei Shomayim take pride in the additional services they offer at no extra charge, such as a beautiful bride's room, ample free parking, and a full time, on-site mashgiach. "I cannot overstate how important it is being on premises at the shul," affirms Les. "There is a special feeling and relationship which we have established. People know that we work together, and that they will be comfortable having a simcha with us. I meet many people who are surprised at how comfortable they are in a synagogue. There truly is a welcoming atmosphere in this building, which when combined with tradition is an environment which cannot be matched."



The friendly logo of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue is a reminder that you're in the right place for your simcha

Canada's boys of summer win Maccabiah gold

By PAUL LUNGEN

The defending gold medalists had just been humbled 2-1 by an up-and-coming team from Mexico, and their bats had been silent through much of that game.

Departing from his normal, low-key approach to coaching, Revin had the guys out for a strenuous workout that consisted of some hard running followed by hitting practice.

The change of pace seemed to work. The boys got keyed up again and their batting improved tremendously after that.

Coupled with strong pitching from all three Canadian hurlers, Canada went on to win its second consecutive gold medal in one of the Maccabiah's prestige events.

Canada won its first fastball gold in 1993 after twice losing to the United States in the finals.

This time around the script was completely different, with the emergence of Mexico making it a three-team race in an eight-country competition.

Divided into two four-team divisions, Canada first played in a round robin format against Argentina, Mexico and Venezuela. In game one, Canada defeated Argentina 5-2 as the South Americans proved a tough opponent. Buoyed by the strong pitching of Alan Rosenblum, who led the tournament with 61 strikeouts, Argentina gave the Canadians a good match.

In game two, Canada blew out the Venezuelans 12-0 and moved on to face Mexico in game three. With the score 0-0 through the first four innings, Mexico went ahead 1-0 in the fifth. Canada quickly tied it but Mexico got the winning run in the sixth and held on for a 2-1 victory.

The Mexican pitcher was strong and the balls Canada did hit seemed to go directly to Mexican fielders, Revin said.

Following the round robin, Argentina, Mexico and Canada all sported 2-1 records but after the tie-breaking formula was employed, which took into account runs allowed, Mexico was awarded first place and Canada second.

With the playoffs approaching, Revin decided to run his tough practice.

Employing a cross-over format, Canada faced the previously undefeated United States in the semi-final. The game was played at Kibbutz Gezer, about half way between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, and the stands were filled with 3,000 spectators, on hand for what many considered the real tournament championship.

"The United States has been our nemesis over the years," Revin conceded. "Our guys played well, we came out hitting and we won 7-1."

The lopsided score was a departure from previous confrontations with the Americans, which always turned into close games decided by late-inning heroics. This time, Canada got tremendous pitching from veteran Mark Bendahan, who allowed only two or three hits.

"He pitched a beautiful ballgame," Revin said. "He was really up for the game. That was the most emotion he's showed in the four Maccabiahs I've been with him."

Helping the Canadian cause were several uncharacteristic U.S. errors that the Canuck capitalized on and an ordinary game from U.S. pitcher David Blackburn, who's been a tower of strength for the Americans in the past.

With the score 2-0 for Canada in the sixth inning of the seven-inning game, Rick Green broke the contest open with a bases loaded triple.

The loss relegated the United States into the bronze medal game, which they won, defeating Israel 11-2.

Canada moved on to the best-of-three final against Mexico. In game one, with a near capacity crowd looking on, David Strauss took to the mound for Canada.

"He pitched a nice ballgame. Our defence was solid in the whole tournament. In the six games we played, we had only one error," Revin said.

I.J. Schecter tripled as Canada won 6-1.

In game two of the final, Revin put Green on the pitching mound for Canada. Although Canada has gone far with its veteran pitchers, it was time to introduce some young blood into a pressure cooker situation, Revin explained.

Green "came through with flying colors." He pitched six innings, had six strikeouts and gave up a couple of hits. Canada dominated the contest and in the last inning Bendahan went in as the closer. He shut the door on any chance of a rally by the Mexicans. The final score was 10-0 as Canada picked up its second consecutive gold medal.

Mexico's ability to advance to the final may be a harbinger of things to come, Revin said. In past Maccabiahs, such as the 1985 games, Canada and the United States dominated, defeating other countries by 10 or 15 runs. This time around, those scores have narrowed considerably and teams like Argentina have a bright future, riding the arm of their young pitcher, Revin said.

Canada meanwhile relied on two veteran pitchers, Bendahan and Strauss, who've been the backbone of the team for several Maccabiahs. It's probably time to look for good young pitchers to take their place, but finding them is proving to be difficult, Revin said.

Identifying positions players, on the other hand, is not as difficult as "there are lots of young guys" playing good calibre softball, he said. With a balanced lineup on hand, he was able to work all the players into the games, giving each one exposure to championship action.

Forced retirement of flight attendants rejected

By JONATHAN SHIFF

Does an airline have the right to retire flight attendants who are beginning to show their age? What if they are aging but not showing it yet?

The collective agreement between El Al and its unions states that the retirement age for flight attendants is 60, whereas members of the ground crew can work until age 65. This is not an unusual practice — British Airways and Air France, for example, force their flight attendants to retire at age 55, although such discrimination is illegal in the United States.

El Al's flight attendants, however, sued over the issue.

The Law of Equal Opportunity in Work was amended in 1995. It now prohibits discrimination among workers based on gender, sexual orientation, personal (family) status, parenthood, age, race, religion, nationality, country of origin, ideology or party affiliation, but does permit differentiating between workers when the reason is a result of the nature of the job or the task.

Therefore, one of the main questions in the El Al case was whether age is a factor in the work of a flight attendant.

Justice Mishael Heshin felt that it was permitted to differentiate between different jobs — flight attendants versus ground crew, for example. Nonetheless, Heshin was of the opinion that forcing anyone to retire completely at age 60 was against public policy.

Had his opinion been accepted, he would have ruled that El Al could retire the flight attendants at age 60, but that the airline would have to offer them another position until age 65. However, his opinion was the minority.

The majority opinion, held by justices Yitzhak Zamir and Dorit Beinish, was that the different retirement age was discriminatory. Zamir rejected El Al's argument that since youthful appearance and good physical condition are requirements for the job, the early retirement was justified. Zamir asked whether youthful appearance was really a requirement of the job or simply a preference of the airline. His conclusion was that the airline companies themselves created the stereotype of a youthful flight attendant, which the public has come to expect. The law banning discrimination exists, in his opinion, to uproot stereotypes that have no justification.

Furthermore, since the collective agreement permits El Al to fire flight attendants for esthetic reasons or for changing outward appearance, there is no need for the early-retirement ruling.

Zamir also rejected the physical condition argument, since he was not convinced that the in-flight service would be lacking if one or two of the attendants were over 60. In addition, he suggested that the added experience and judgment of the more mature attendants compensate for any deterioration in physical condition.

The El Al case illustrates how the judges attempted to interpret laws to fit what they perceived as the purpose behind them or the Knesset's intent. In this context, Zamir's distinction between requirements of the job (which the Knesset does not see as discriminatory) and preferences of the employer (which are considered discriminating) is convincing, but in itself raises some difficult issues:

First of all, there will be many situations in which the employer believes that certain characteristics are requirements of a job and may, therefore, have trouble applying the ruling. Thus, for example, the Israeli newspapers have reporters who cover the haredi world. If a woman was denied the job on the basis that she would have trouble obtaining access and interviews in some cases, is that a requirement of the job or a stereotype that the law forbids? The answer seems obvious — the law surely forbids discrimination against women. But the employer would argue that being a woman essentially prevents the reporter from doing the job.

Furthermore, the case raises the issue of retirement ages. Using Zamir's reasoning, since employers are permitted to fire workers who are no longer capable of fulfilling their tasks, one could argue that retirement ages are unnecessary and therefore discriminatory.

This criticism does not take away from the fact that the case is an important one and, in my opinion, a good decision. It does not, however, close the book on the issue or even provide clear guidelines for the future.

About Life

Dear Ella,

After literally years of going to singles' dances, I've finally met someone I seemed to click with.

We spent the evening dancing and then we walked and talked for hours. I really felt I hit pay dirt with this guy. He was bright, funny, sensitive and cute. Sounds great right? Wrong. He called me the next day and left a message on my answering machine. When I returned his call, a woman answered the phone. It turned out to be his mother. It seems this 35 year old man still lives at home with his parents.

I was completely blown away. Here I thought this was it and then I end up finding this huge flaw. I don't understand why a 35-year-old grown man would still be living at home with his parents. Do you have any clues as to what I should do now?

Home Not So Sweet Home

Dear Home Not So Sweet Home,

It sounds to me like you are completely disturbed by the fact that this man lives at home with his parents, yet when you originally met him you felt he was the one you've been waiting to meet for some time now.

Don't be so quick to write this guy off. There could be many reasons for his living at home. He could be caring for his parents who may be ill, he could be between jobs, he may just be keeping his mother company while his father is out of town or it could be a temporary stopover so he can save quickly for a down payment on a house. The reasons are endless.

I understand that you are afraid this man you have met has not been able to tear himself from his parents' strings. Anyone would be leery of a guy living at home at the age of 35. Talk to him. Be forward and ask him why he is living with his parents. If his answer resembles something like my mother cooks, cleans and does my laundry for me, well, you'll know what to do from there.

However, you may be pleasantly surprised. He may just be exercising the sensitivity you found so appealing when you first met.

Home Not So Sweet Home may still be as sweet as you first believed. Give him a chance.

Kalejs ordered deported

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An immigration adjudicator has ordered Konrad Kalejs deported for being an accomplice to war crimes and crimes against humanity.

Kalejs was ordered to appear at Pearson International Airport at 5:30 p.m. last Monday for deportation to an, as of then, unidentified destination. He seemed dumbfounded by the news, as just 30 minutes earlier, his lawyer had won for him the right to remain at large pending deportation.

In a 60-page decision read in a downtown Toronto hearing room on Monday, adjudicator Anthony Iozzo found that Kalejs served as commander of the external guards at the Salaspils concentration camp.

Acts of barbarous cruelty took place in the camp, including murder, beatings and starvation. By voluntarily serving as commander of the outside guards, Kalejs was an accomplice to war crimes and crimes against humanity, Iozzo stated.

"Konrad Kalejs is accountable for what he did at Salaspils." He was a principle offender and not merely an onlooker to events and he could have left the Arajs Kommando, which guarded the camp, during his service there from the summer of 1942 to at least December 1942, Iozzo said.

In finding Kalejs a war criminal under the definition set up by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Imre Finta case, Iozzo found Kalejs lied in denying that he was a member of the Arajs Kommando and that he was commander of external guards as Salaspils.

However, he had many observers shaking their heads as he found untrustworthy much evidence that suggested Kalejs led a ski unit that decimated a village and murdered its inhabitants.

Iozzo rejected the testimony of several former members of the Arajs Kommando that Kalejs was responsible for war crimes in the villages of Saniki and Zabalotye.

While finding that Kalejs lied about his membership in the Arajs Kommando and his service at Salaspils, he gave Kalejs the benefit of the doubt on almost every other point.

The decision elated Rhonda Pasternack, who lives in the same North York condominium building where Kalejs resides.

"I'm ecstatic," she said, adding that she and many other condominium residents hoped he would be deported as soon as possible.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith expressed satisfaction with the decision, although spokespersons for both groups said Iozzo was wrong on numerous historical facts regarding the Arajs Kommando. They disputed his suggestion that the Arajs Kommando was anything other than a dedicated murder unit.

Kalejs has the option of seeking a judicial review of Iozzo's order in a federal court.

Israel, PA talk security

By JON IMMANUEL, JAY BUSHINSKY and MARGOT DUDKEVITCH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Palestinian security officials met in Ramallah Sunday night under the eye of U.S. officials in a triangular framework laid down during the visit last week by U.S. special envoy Dennis Ross.

Meanwhile, senior government sources shrugged off a Sunday Telegraph report that General Security Service chief Ami Ayalon had flown to London to investigate claims that the Machane Yehuda bombing was planned in England.

The sources called the report in the British newspaper "just nonsense."

They said they knew Ayalon had been abroad recently, but were unable to pinpoint his itinerary. "We don't know the details," they said.

At the Ramallah meeting, Israeli officials expressed interest in examining the explosives found in a Hamas bomb factory in Beit Sahur last month. The Palestinians asked Israel to drop the series of measures it has taken restricting Palestinian economic life since the Machane Yehuda bombing.

The Israelis said they were satisfied with the cooperation of Palestinian security forces in the investigation into the bombing. They agreed to meet again.

The Palestinian Authority (PA) has threatened an economic boycott of Israel to protest the Israeli measures, particularly the withholding of tax revenues.

The meeting follows one between Yitzhak Molho, the prime minister's adviser, and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat. Molho thanked Arafat for the speedy arrest of suspects in the murder of Shmuel Ben-Baruch and asked for similar diligence in the search for terrorists.

ISRAEL

Soldiers Sentenced

JERUSALEM – Two Israeli border policemen, Tzahi Shmaya, 19, and David Ben Abu, 20, have been sentenced to eight months in prison and a 12-month suspended sentence for beating Palestinians who tried to enter Jerusalem without proper permits last October.

The judge who handed down the sentences was quoted as saying he hoped the punishment would deter recurrences of such actions by border police.

The sentences, which will take effect in 45 days to give the two time to appeal, came the day after an Israeli human rights group issued a report that ill-treatment of Palestinians was extremely widespread among border police.

Message Denied

JERUSALEM – Aides to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu are denying a newspaper report that Netanyahu has agreed to a partial withdrawal from the Golan Heights in exchange for concessions on security arrangements from Syria.

The Israeli daily Yediot Achronot reported last week that Netanyahu had recently conveyed a message to Syrian President Hafez al-Assad in which he proposed a formula for determining the extent of the withdrawal.

Netanyahu spokesperson Shai Bazak denied the report.

Stalking Settlers

JERUSALEM – A Hamas official recently expelled from the United States has called on Palestinians to turn the lives of Jewish settlers "into an unbearable hell."

Mousa Mohammed Abu Marzook, whose comments were published in the United Arab Emirates, also told a magazine, "We call on our people in Palestine to stalk the herds of these spiteful settlers."

Marzook, who was the head of Hamas' political wing, had lived in the United States for 15 years before he was detained at a New York airport in July 1995 because his name was on a list of suspected terrorists.

More than 140 workshops are being planned for the delegates. The Union of American Hebrew Congregations is the central body of Reform Judaism in North America, uniting 1.5 million Reform Jews in more than 860 synagogues.

Klinghoffer Case Settled

NEW YORK – The family of Leon Klinghoffer, a disabled passenger killed by Palestinian terrorists aboard an Italian cruise ship 12 years ago, has closed a long and painful chapter of their lives by agreeing to settle a lawsuit with the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). The sum agreed upon was not disclosed, which was a condition of the settlement, according to a family spokesperson.

The PLO also settled with Crown Travel, the New Jersey tour operator that booked the fateful cruise.

The attack on Klinghoffer, whose body was thrown off the Achille Lauro into the Mediterranean Sea, for years exemplified the scourge of random violence emanating from the Middle East conflict.

WORLD WIDE WEB

Telfed Web Site

JERUSALEM – Telfed has launched a site on the World Wide Web for the interest of the South African Jewish community all over the world.

The site address is [http://www.telfed.org.il].

Showdown at Western Wall

JERUSALEM – The showdown between haredi and liberal Jews at the Western Wall plaza last week is the latest sign of the growing struggle between the two groups to define the nature of the Jewish state.

As Tisha b'Av began on Monday evening Aug. 11, haredi men began trying to shout over the prayers of about 200 men and women worshiping together in a specially designated area at the entrance to the Western Wall plaza, a couple hundred yards from the Wall itself.

Most haredi Jews find such egalitarian prayer groups offensive.

Anxious to avoid a confrontation with the thousands of haredi men milling about the plaza, police, braced for confrontation, quickly broke up the non-Orthodox prayer group and herded them forcibly through security gates at the entrance to the plaza.

Then the police forced the group another hundred yards down a driveway leading to the Dung Gate out of the Old City, as the Conservative Jews sang a Hebrew prayer calling on God to make peace in the heavens and within the nation of Israel.

Toronto man mourns slain mother

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shimshon Stern weeps for a mother lost, but not to old age or even disease. Leah Stern was a hale 69, out shopping for others, when two Arab suicide bombers detonated the blasts that killed them and 14 others in the July 30 attack at the Machane Yehuda market in Jerusalem.

Leah Stern's son, a teacher at Toronto's Yeshiva Yesodei Hatorah, now has nothing left but the memories of a mother who survived Hitler, only to die a violent death at the hands of those who also kill out of political fanaticism.

"She had a smile for everybody. She only thought of others and had a good word for everyone," says Stern from his hospital bed, where he's recovering from a knee injury suffered the night before the fateful blast that claimed his mother. Choking back tears, and occasionally letting them flow freely, he adjusts his black velvet kippah and gazes straight ahead. "She will be missed," he whispers.

A Romanian-born Holocaust survivor, Leah Stern had two other sons, a daughter and 24 grandchildren. "Her every word to them could last for generations," Stern says. "She wanted the best for everybody."

By all media accounts, and certainly according to Stern, Leah

Stern was a remarkable woman. A frequent visitor to Toronto to see her son, his wife and their eight children, aged one to 16, she was a widow who moved to Israel in 1994 from Los Angeles, where she and her late husband had gone from New York after retirement several years earlier .

Leah had cared for her husband for the four years he suffered with Alzheimer disease, until his death in 1993. "She hid his disease from her children for two full years," her son recalls, "so we shouldn't suffer. The doctors gave him one year, and he lived [with the disease] for over four. She did for him what no one would do."

Shimshon Stern moved to Toronto in 1977 and has been teaching at Yeshiva Yesodei Hatorah for 12 years. "She loved Toronto," he says of his mother. "She said it reminded her of Europe. She loved that it's so clean and beautiful. She always had a good word for the city."

Stern kept busy schedule in Jerusalem

Although she lived alone in her beloved Jerusalem, Leah Stern kept a busy schedule. She was involved with an organization called Yad Eliezer, whose volunteers prepare and deliver home-cooked meals to poor Orthodox families in the city.

On July 30, she paid a rare visit to the crowded Machane Yehuda market to buy food for others.

Shimshon Stern...

a son mourns

The day after the blast, Leah was buried in Bnei Brak, between her husband and her father.

Stern couldn't attend the funeral because of his knee. "Deep in my heart," he says softly, "I know she didn't want to be a burden to her children."

In Israel, President Ezer Weizman and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert sent their sympathies to the family.

In this country, Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy telephoned Stern to offer condolences.

"She could have easily died in [the Holocaust]," muses Stern. "It's a big merit to die because one is a Jew. But G-d granted her another 50 years, and she raised a family. But still died because she was a Jew.

"To die for the sanctity of G-d is a kiddush HaShem."

UJA FEDERATION
Funding IN ACTION

Challenges do not frighten Casey Cipin. They are part of what she faces every day as Special Needs Coordinator for Centre Camp at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Centre Camp is unique, because it serves both children with and without special needs. Thanks to UJA Federation, Centre Camp is a means for special needs children to be integrated with others in a caring, fun-loving environment.

PATIENCE PAYS OFF

"Clare" a 10 year old girl with Downs Syndrome has been coming to Centre Camp for three years. Clare has different needs than other campers, so it's important that staff members know how to deal with her. "Often Clare may not want to participate in an activity," says Casey. "I must explain to her how important her role is, and this requires extreme patience. Patience is the key."

So is being creative. Since many of the children with autism, behavioural difficulties or developmental delays have short attention spans, Casey must be able to think quickly and come up with new ways to get them motivated. Enter Creativity 101. "I have thought of everything from piggy-back rides to finger nail painting," she says. "Sometimes, it's the other campers who will take Clare's hand to join the rest of the group. That's really great to see."

"Many campers who were once shy and withdrawn, have done a complete turn-around," explains Casey. "It's very fulfilling to see how the kids have matured."

BENEFITS BEYOND CAMP

And the satisfaction stretches far beyond the camp grounds. All the children - with or without special needs - are learning to interact as one despite differences.

MAKING A DIFFERENCE

"The greatest accomplishment," Casey stresses, "is knowing that at the end of summer, you have helped to make a difference in these campers' lives. It's wonderful to see so many of the same faces return year after year."

Interpreting surveys

Last week in this space, I brought to the attention of readers certain aspects of the important debate currently unfolding among observers of Jewish life on the future of Diaspora Jewry.

I tried to place the debate in the context of the long-standing culture and tradition of discussion and disagreement, which I described as being "part of the deep structure of Jewish intellectual history and pedagogical method."

At times we all grow weary of the ubiquity of opinions, theories, theses and expert advice on every conceivable subject. But it is in this exchange of views, often across a span of many years, that knowledge accumulates and ideas become refined into the fine powder that can ignite human achievement.

Specifically I first pointed out the machloket, difference of opinion, on the proper interpretation of Jewish demographics.

I published an excerpt from a statement by J.J. Goldberg, who, in an article in the New York Times, challenged the accuracy of the 1990 National Jewish Population Survey conducted in the United States on behalf of the Council of Jewish Federations. He refuted one of the survey's key findings that 52 percent of American Jews were intermarrying. Goldberg asserted that the figure was closer to 38 percent.

Goldberg furthermore maintained that organized Jewry's call for a return to core Jewish values did not have "the least chance of engaging most American Jews (because) they remain steadfastly liberal in their religious and political leanings."

I then seized upon Goldberg's faith in the liberalism of American Jewry as a segue to the diametrically opposite and rather stark observation written by Hillel Halkin in an article provocatively entitled "After Zionism" that appeared in the June 1997 volume of Commentary.

"The majority of American Jews will want nothing to do with (traditional Judaism). And as Jews, they or their children will disappear." (Our emphasis)

But the demise of Diaspora Jewry is not as certain in the minds of others as it is for Halkin. Not surprisingly, there is a very profound disagreement on the subject.

In an article published two weeks ago in the Jerusalem Post, Abraham Rabinovich reported on the 12th World Congress of Jewish Studies recently held at Hebrew University.

As reported by Rabinovich, Halkin's sullen prediction was squarely contradicted by a number of the speakers who participated in the conference.

For example, quoting Neil Gillman of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, Rabinovich wrote: "Judaism is undergoing a dramatic transformation, at least in America. (Our emphasis) The long accepted focus of Jewishness as a communal sharing of destiny is giving way...to an embrace of Judaism as a religion."

Quoting Prof. Arthur Hertzberg of New York University, Rabinovich wrote: "Jews have been lost in large scale assimilation into majority cultures since antiquity. However, "a saving remnant' has always carried the torch and will again, despite the assimilationist outflow that will be suffered to a consumer society with no moral values." (Our emphasis)

The "debate" over the viability and nature of the Jewish future is not new. It has been argued since Jewish history began and will be argued until the end of time.

The challenge for us is to avoid being mere observers of the discussion. Rather, we must take an active part, we must engage ourselves fully in its passion, we must set an example for the people who will follow.

Jewish headstone fragment found in Toronto park

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A mystery is brewing over what could be a fragment of a headstone from a vandalized Jewish cemetery.

About two weeks ago, a Toronto couple and their children were enjoying a hot summer day in a park at Yonge and Davisville. While the kids were cooling off in the park's wading pool, the father came upon an irregularly-shaped slab of stone resting against a tree. On closer inspection, he noticed the name "Yosef" inscribed in Hebrew letters.

Thinking it must be part of a headstone from a Jewish grave, he brought it home and contacted his rabbi. The rabbi suggested publicizing it through The CJN might reveal more information about the headstone.

The CJN contacted Canadian Jewish Congress to determine whether a Jewish cemetery had been reported vandalized recently, but Congress spokesperson Danny Fine said community relations officials were unaware of any cemetery desecrations in recent months.

This fragment from a headstone was found in a park at Yonge and Davisville. [Paul Lungen photo]

And so the mystery as to how a portion of a Jewish headstone came to a city park remains. The couple have consulted with the rabbi about possible dispositions of the headstone but are keen to pass it along to the family to whom it belongs.

Anyone with information about the headstone is asked to call 416-480-9386.

Shalom Food Project to expand

TORONTO — The road to social action is sometimes paved with muffins, toast and fresh fruit. Just ask Miriam Kalushner, who transformed her concern about hunger into the Shalom Food Project, which facilitates one breakfast club, and is about to launch another this fall.

Diverging from the path blazed by Mazon Canada, Kalushner wanted to broaden the Jewish community's response to hunger and she sought out like-minded individuals who banded together to form the food project. From its beginning, participants were determined to help initiate programs that would be run by the people who used them.

The project's first program was a breakfast club at Plaut Manor, a 97-unit apartment building on Eglinton Avenue near Keele Street. The building, born out of the vision of the social action committee of Holy Blossom Temple, provides subsidized housing for those who would otherwise lack the resources to find adequate shelter.

"Many of the tenants are single mothers who are managing, against all odds, to raise families and put food on their table," says Kalushner.

But food on the table can put a large dent in a small budget. The breakfast club at Plaut Manor offers children a nutritious breakfast five mornings a week for a nominal fee. The program is run entirely by tenants: the cook, her assistant, and a small army of volunteers all live in Plaut Manor.

The breakfast club recently celebrated its third anniversary, and the Shalom Food Project plans to help facilitate a similar club at a building at Runnymede and St. Clair this fall. Kalushner sees the continued growth of the Shalom Food Project as a mixed blessing.

Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla gets new rabbi...

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Yoseph Oziel

TORONTO — As the new spiritual leader of Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation, Rabbi Yoseph Oziel likes to lace his English-language sermons with a few words of Spanish, but he could as easily throw in some Yiddish expressions.

A native of Rabat, Morocco, who immigrated to Canada at age 4, Rabbi Oziel grew up in Montreal, absorbing Sephardi tradition at home and at the Merkaz Sépharade Synagogue; and immersing himself in study at the Ashkenazi institution (Yeshiva Gedola) where he obtained smichah five years ago, along the way acquiring a working knowledge of Yiddish.

He attended high school at the same yeshivah, later pursuing rabbinic and post-rabbinic studies, specializing in Talmud and Halachah.

Along with fellow Sephardi students, he was encouraged to maintain Sephardi traditions. His rosh yeshivah, the late Rabbi Mordechai Weinberg, insisted they "not lose the wealth of Sephardi traditions," he recalled.

Both Rabbi Weinberg and his successor, Rabbi Shlomo Altusky, have been "a tremendous source of inspiration."

Like Rabbi Amram Assayag, Rabbi Oziel's predecessor (now associated with the Sephardic Kehila Centre set to open next month in Thornhill), the new rabbi is taking over leadership of the 350-family congregation at a relatively young age.

Rabbi Oziel is 25, and married with a 3-year-old son. He was chaplain at Montreal's Centre Communautaire Juif (CCJ) for two years before accepting the Toronto position, and served on the Communauté Sépharade du Québec's Commission des Affaires Religieuses and in the conversion department of Montreal's beit din.

He knew little about the Toronto community before arriving here last month, and to the best of his knowledge is not related to the dozens of Oziels in Toronto. Coincidentally, a cousin of his, also named Yoseph Oziel, is a rabbi in Caracas, Venezuela.

The Toronto rabbi enjoys seeing the range of Sephardi-Ashkenazi interaction in Toronto, he said. Rabbi Assayag, for example, is a past president of the Vaad Harabanim, Toronto's umbrella group for Orthodox rabbis; and Or Haemet Sephardic School counts among its students some Ashkenazi children, he noted.

Rabbi Oziel hopes to build bridges with all the Jewish communities in Toronto, he said. "We have to be one. As leaders, our objective is to maintain a standard of tradition and religion. Whatever our differences, they should not cause us to sacrifice what we're here for, and that is to lead the next generation into the future."

At the CCJ, much of Rabbi Oziel's work was with teenagers, running Shabbatonim and acting as a consultant. He also taught conversion classes and lectured in the greater community.

Rabbi Oziel's focus on youth extends to young adults, some of whom are older than he is. His goal is kiruv (bringing people closer to Judaism).

"I like to lecture about things that I feel people, on an individual and community level, can gain a lot from," he said. One of his projects in Montreal was a weekly lunch for businesspeople, at which he would lead discussions on a variety of Jewish issues.

He plans to continue "full force" working with youth here, and was impressed to see some 50 teens from the synagogue's youth organization planning a fashion show fundraiser when he visited Petah Tikva on a Sunday earlier this year.

"In Montreal, if a 16-year-old isn't religious, you wouldn't see him [at synagogue]. It's nice to see that young people still feel attached to the synagogue. When I saw that, it really made me see that there's a future here."

Women study Torah at yarchei kallah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For three days in the dog days of August, a group of nearly 60 women didn't shop, garden or laze in the sun – they studied Torah.

For the third year, a yarchei kallah was held under the auspices of Nishmat, the Jerusalem Centre for Advanced Jewish Studies for Women. (The three weeks before Tisha b'Av are traditionally a time for reflection and study.)

Rabbanit Chana Henkin, dean of Nishmat, facilitated the event, which included chavruta (partnered) learning and lectures.

While in previous years the topic has been a theme (once prophets and once midrash), this year the group studied Shir Hashirim, The Song of Songs.

Rabbanit Henkin moved enthusiastically around the beit midrash of Or Chaim Yeshiva in North York, encouraging, explaining, listening.

Groups of two, three or four women, from the young, fresh out of day school, to elderly grandmothers; those fluent in Hebrew and those with little or no knowledge of the language; the learned and the beginner formed learning groups and talked, laughed and argued to an understanding of Shir Hashirim, a love story written by King Solomon as an allegory of the relationship between G-d and the people of Israel.

So intent were they, that the explicitly sensual text produced only a few giggles and blushes.

Rabbanit Henkin told The CJN that "for many years, women were passive about Torah learning. They were spared the agony and the ecstacy of analysis."

Nishmat and the yarchei kallah, "often give women the first opportunity" to analyse text, she said, noting that some participants arrived early to begin studying. "It energizes the spirit."

In Israel, Nishmat "opens the highest reaches of Torah learning to women," Rabbanit Henkin said. It equips "mothers, grandmothers, beginners and teachers, those from Israel and those from the Diaspora with the tools to study from the original sources. The most advanced study Talmud."

Nishmat is introducing a hesder program for young religious women who choose to do national service rather than serve in the army. It will function like the hesder yeshivot, where participants combine Torah study with military service.

...and its youth organization new driving force

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Thirty years ago Max Benaim, now 46, started the Petah Tikva Youth Organization (PTYO). Two years ago, his son Jacky became the driving force in revitalizing the synagogue youth group that also serves Toronto's greater Sephardi population.

"I think we have it in our blood," said Max, a native of Tangiers who immigrated to Canada in 1964. Himself a former president of Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation and former director of the now defunct Ontario Sephardic Association, Max is PTYO's adviser.

He described Jacky, 16, as "a go-getter" who thrives on doing what he believes in, but admitted to having given him an initial push.

"I think I would have started it even if he didn't give me the push," said Jacky.

The future of a community is its youth, believes Max. "Without youth, [you are] without pillars."

To the best of his knowledge, PTYO is the only Sephardi youth organization in Ontario.

Its most recent coup was Project Shalom '97, a three-week summer trip to Israel, for which the teens spent most of this year fundraising. Max and his wife Estrella chaperoned the 18 teens, including their younger son Marcos, 14, on the trip planned in conjunction with the Canada-Israel Experience Centre.

Jacky, now president of PTYO and a student at Thornhill's Westmount Collegiate Institute, got the PTYO ball rolling again a couple of years ago after a Shabbat dinner conversation with his cousin Jacky Benarroch (now PTYO chair) at their grandparents' home.

"We were described in shul as the 'bad boys' [a description with which Max took issue, allowing only that they were forthcoming with their opinions]. We decided we were going to do something that would blow their minds."

"No one thought we were really going to pull it off," said Jacky.

Events such as basketball tournaments, bowling nights, dances, Shabbatonim at Olympia Sports Camp and Sunday Tfillin Club at the synagogue proved that they were serious.

The boys started off by phoning an estimated 75 people. Their first planning meeting drew about a dozen. Membership has since grown to 60 people, including a few Ashkenazi members.

For the past several months, PTYO's focus has been on the Israel trip to the exclusion of everything else. Now Jacky would like to concentrate on expanding membership. "I'm very confident we'll get at least 80 members by September."

PTYO has organized the shul's Purim carnival for the past two years, with about 200 people attending each one. A fashion show and two rummage sales, all held earlier this year, raised several thousand dollars to subsidize the Israel trip.

A continuity grant from Canadian Jewish Congress, a grant from the synagogue and some private funding also helped keep the cost down to $1700 per student.

It's the first time Petah Tikva and PTYO are organizing an event of such magnitude, said Max, although a small delegation of Toronto youth joined a 1987 Israel trip run by the Canadian Sephardi Federation in Montreal.

"Hopefully [the teens] will get a feeling of being proud of being Jewish, and being Zionist," Max said before leaving for Israel.

The last night of the trip underscored that sentiment for Jacky and other participants. Shortly before they caught their flight to Toronto, they stopped to join thousands of other youngsters at the World Zionist Congress singing Israel's national anthem and admiring a fireworks display commemorating 100 years of Zionism.

"That was the most touching and emotional ending, or even moment, in lots of our lives," said Jacky.

Dry Bones
RATS!! THEY'VE GOT ME SURROUNDED!
BUT WAIT!... WHAT IS THAT BUGLE SOUND I HEAR?
WHY... IT'S THE UNITED STATES CAVALRY
RIDING IN TO SAVE ME ...AGAIN!

Most poignant legacy

By now, everyone knows how the names on the dormant Swiss bank accounts from World War II came to be published. The Swiss bankers were shamed into it by the World Jewish Congress (WJC) through the initiative of Edgar Bronfman.

In October, the Swiss Bankers' Association is scheduled to release the names on the remaining dormant bank accounts. Some 18,000 names are expected to be published and added to the 1,800 names already disclosed to the public. Not surprisingly, the account holders were not all Jews. But the vast majority were.

The search for the rightful heirs and claimants to the property in these accounts has now begun and will continue through the coming months and years. But the money in these accounts is only part of the property which the Swiss and others unlawfully withheld or even stole from their rightful Jewish owners. Unaccounted for are the untold treasures and heirlooms looted from homes and businesses, the gold detached from individuals or from their corpses, and the funds and personal property stored in safety deposit boxes.

Ultimately, as a matter of justice, there will be a reckoning. We must be prepared for that day.

Wherever property can be traced to an heir or next of kin or rightful family claimant, it must be returned. But wherever property cannot be so traced, where unfortunately it no longer has any identifiable rightful claimant or claimants, we suggest it devolve, on certain terms, to the World Jewish Congress (WJC) and the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), the two universally recognized non-governmental but central Jewish bodies in the name of and on behalf of the Jewish people worldwide.

Those terms cannot be delineated comprehensively in this space. But in our opinion the use of untraceable, unclaimed funds should conform to the following broad principles and parameters.

- All such unclaimed funds should be combined with the undisbursed monies presently in the hands of the central restitution organizations into one Jewish Future Fund.
- Monies from the fund should be used to help alleviate the poverty, misery and suffering of needy individual survivors.
- The central purpose of the fund should be to help alleviate the greatest need of the Jewish people on a worldwide communal basis, namely, the need to ensure a creative, knowledgeable Jewish future.

The most effective way to do that is through education. This has been established beyond any doubt by countless experts in countless communities. Education, of course, must be defined broadly to include adult education, summer camp experiences and Israel experiences. But the cornerstone of education, the foundation on which the entire structure rests, is the education of our children. Moreover, in the years ahead, in a variety of ways, both for the sake of our children and for the sake of Israel-Diaspora relations, Israel will have to play a greater role in worldwide Jewish education. Developing and enhancing JAFI's ability to be one of the key instruments for imparting that education will be an important component of the Jewish education enterprise.

It is our suggestion therefore that the Jewish Future Fund be used to subsidize, if not fully underwrite, in perpetuity, the cost of Jewish education through high school for every Jewish child whose parents seek Jewish education for him or her in every community where Jews reside. The administrative infrastructure for doing so already exists. The appropriate formulae can be established among the WJC, JAFI and local federations or equivalent local Jewish councils.

Could there be a more poignant legacy from the millions who were murdered to the millions of Jewish children yet to be born?

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"All at once, twenty years ago, after a slumber of thirty to sixty years, anti-Semitism once more broke out from the innermost depths of the nations, and revealed to the highest of the mortified Jews his real situation, which he had no longer seen."

(From Nordau's address: The Situation Of The Jews Throughout The World)

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

August 21,1843 fire destroyed Toronto's Theatre Royal, causing W.G. Noah, the city's first Jewish theatre manager, to lose his job.(Canadian Jewish Congress Archives)

Honest claims of ordinary Jews refused

Your reader Charlotte Lintzel (CJN, Aug. 7) has made a good point with respect to her claim for reparations. It does not "conform exactly to conditions set forward by the Claims Conference." I agree with her that simply the fact of "being a Jewish child in Hitler's Germany," let alone spending even a brief time in a ghetto or camp, hiding, or even escaping successfully from the Nazi terror, should merit a positive response from the Claims Conference. Were lives and education not disrupted, psychological or physical damage not sustained, normal development not interrupted and simple pleasure not turned to horror for Jewish children and their families?

Unfortunately, Lintzel has to be told that the Claims Conference is an independent Jewish body founded in 1951 by the World Zionist Organization to process reparations to Nazi victims outside Israel (Jerusalem Report, May 15). And that this strange body, as the owner and arbiter of payments and properties claimed by Jews, is making its own hostile rules for withholding its assets from survivors and their heirs.

It appears to me that with all of our preoccupation with the misappropriation of funds by Swiss banks, we are neglecting the inappropriate behavior of our own elite toward the honest claims of ordinary Jews who may be in need.

Shamed by Canadian vote on Israel at UN

While I applaud the leadership of Prime Minister Jean Chrétien in many instances, I am ashamed of our nation's vote at the UN recently, with regards to Israel.

I am profoundly ashamed that Canada turned its back on Israel. I would have expected much better.

Have we not gotten past the age of bigotry?

Don't use 'shiksah' or 'shaygetz'

Recently, the media reported on the Canadian Jewish Congress' quick and aggressive response, demanding an apology from a Western Canadian journalist who had used the term "jewed" during a broadcast.

The Jewish community is fortunate to have organizations on guard against verbal misdemeanors and insensitivity to language directed at us.

Ignorant misuse of the English language and the utterance of stereotypical pejoratives are not the monopoly of non-Jews, however. I have often heard people in our community – casually and sometimes unknowingly – use such terms as shiksah or shaygetz in reference to gentiles. According to Yiddish etymologists, the roots of these words come from the biblical term meaning "abominable," certainly not praiseworthy descriptions.

Although the words goyim and shvartzeh literally mean "the nations" and "the black" (in reference to non-Jews and blacks), seemingly harmless traditional adjectives, the intonation and underlying spirit with which these words are expressed by many of our community members are often less than complimentary.

L. Wittgenstin, an Austrian philosopher, said, "The limits of our language are the limits of our soul." Judaism states that it is important for one to "guard their words" and speak in a pure and knowing manner. We should therefore use some of our energy to stem the flow of hurtful epithets directed at us, to strengthen our own awareness and and educate ourselves about the language we may be directing at others.

Against 'naysayers' on Israel's future

In his front page article "Nothing has changed: Caught in a trap" (CJN, Aug. 7), Josef Lapid tells us nothing. Unfortunately, his only contribution is to confirm his view that we are trapped in a corner with no solution. His comments of "damned if you do and damned if you don't" demonstrates a hopelessness which is not and has never been a part of Jewish attitude or past.

The CJN should lead with a more positive and optimistic line.

Decision time for Israelis and Arabs

At some point, the people of Israel will have to decide if peace is worth pursuing when their enemies do not want it and are not ready for a peaceful alliance. They also have to finally decide on the issue of borders and land area. The world must know that some borders are inviolable. Israel needs enough land to give it adequate protection and room to satisfy their needs. Left to the Arab world, the Israelis would be in the sea.

The Arab world has to accept their Palestinian brothers, help them with aid from their great oil and land wealth and help them to establish a country of their own instead of supplying them with weapons and terror training. Food, non-propagandistic education, social assistance and housing will do more for them than pushing them to fight. The Palestinians are being used as pawns of destruction in a larger game which involves the inability of the Arab world to accept their Israeli neighbors or anyone who does not follow Islam.

Jerusalem: city of powerful passions

By GARY ROSENBLATT
New York Jewish Week

The poet Yehuda Amichai once wrote of a couple searching for a place to make love in Jerusalem. Their effort was in vain because every site was suffused with sanctity, every stone a battlefield for holiness.

Jerusalem is a city of powerful passions – political, cultural and religious – and that is why there is so much strife over physical and emotional turf here. This week's ugly showdown involving a group of Conservative Jews, excessively forceful police and taunting Haredim in the shadow of the Western Wall on Tisha b'Av, is just another symptom of the religious-cultural clash that threatens to destroy the country from within.

Jerusalem has become a city increasingly divided, and never mind the conflict between Arab and Jew. When Haredim, who now make up about 25 percent of the city's population, lay claim to a neighborhood, less observant Jews move away. So there are fewer "mixed" neighborhoods these days and secular Jews continue their flight from the city, abandoning it to the Orthodox.

The centrist Orthodox are outraged by the situation. As religious Zionists whose children serve faithfully in the army in addition to studying Torah, they have little tolerance for the Haredim who do not take up arms. And they resent that anti-Orthodox Israelis lump them together with their more extreme brethren who do not share their live-and-let-live attitude toward other Jews.

Ehud Olmert, the mayor who was elected on the strength of the haredi vote, continues to cater to his most powerful clientele. In frustration and anger, the anti-Orthodox rhetoric from critics of the Haredim, who see themselves as the keepers of the tradition, has grown increasingly ugly. Everywhere you go, people complain that the situation is getting worse, and that it could lead to a civil war.

And so it is that despite the delightfully cool evening breezes here, one can feel emotionally claustrophobic at times. With so many people choosing to live in Jerusalem to stake their claim, whatever it may be, the feuding groups are in each other's faces in this city, where every place is holy and thus worth fighting over, it seems.

One feels the need to get away, to see the less glamorous but more real Israel. For just as no one can appreciate Israel without visiting Jerusalem, the spiritual centre of Judaism, it is also difficult to understand the national psyche by spending time only in the holiest city.

I feel I got a more typical sense of life in this country in recent days by visiting such unremarkable cities as Hadera, Pardes Chana and Or Akiva in the north and Beersheva in the Negev.

In each, I saw people from economically lower and middle classes, people of many diverse backgrounds – Ashkenazim, Sephardim, Russians, Ethiopians and native Israelis – going about their daily life, interacting naturally. The scene in such cities is not idyllic. There are ongoing tensions between the haves and the have-nots, with the most recent immigrants being the lowest in the economic and social pecking order. But there is a basic sense of community, of people working toward a common goal.

Hadera, a city of about 40,000, has a slower pace than big cities like Tel Aviv or Haifa. The dress is casual and the architecture nondescript. On the downtown streets in late afternoon, the talk is more likely to be about the day's soccer match than the latest Mideast diplomatic machination.

Beersheva, about a two-hour drive south of Jerusalem, is of particular interest because some see it as the major Israeli city of the future, the oasis in the desert – in part because it is far removed from large Arab populations. There are about 150,000 people living in Beersheva today, 96 percent of them Jewish, and city planners say that by the year 2020 there will be more than 750,000 people living in the greater metropolitan area.

Large numbers of Russians settled here in the last decade, though some of the more successful ones have left for jobs in the centre of the country. But Ben-Gurion University, with more than 12,000 students, continues to grow, and more companies are building in the area. A prime topic among university social planners is their effort to dissuade the government from building a hazardous waste dump near Beersheva, arguing that in two decades it would imperil the population.

Driving back toward Jerusalem, ascending the winding roads, one feels the mood change in the thinning air. I am returning to the city where cosmic issues take precedence over daily ones, where the ancient stones are steeped in holiness but too many of the people lack compassion for each other.

If there is good news, it is that in the wake of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, the religious-secular divide has grown so alarming that some people have begun to act out of genuine concern for the fate of the country. In the last year, dozens of dialogue groups have started for Orthodox and secular teens, as well as for adults seeking to bridge the gap; an experimental elementary school composed of secular and religious children and teachers is flourishing; and growing numbers of secular intellectuals are studying Jewish texts to reclaim their tradition.

Most of these efforts are based in Jerusalem, where the need is greatest, as a model for the rest of the country. What may work best are programs stressing basic tolerance rather than any romantic effort to accept the other's views. Mostly missing from this equation, though, are the Haredim, the most broad-minded of whom are not prepared to engage in serious dialogue.

The Mideast peace talks, as fragile as they are, offer a glimmer of hope because Palestinians and Israelis may come to appreciate a need to tolerate each other, recognizing that fate made them neighbors and neither side is moving away. The prospect of some similar accommodation between Haredim and secular Jews seems more remote, though, since they only have each other to live with and to blame.

Only when the mourning over ancient Jerusalem's stones turns to compassion for the modern city's flesh and blood will there be cause here for rejoicing.

Gary Rosenblatt, editor and publisher of the New York Jewish Week, is a recipient of the Marie Syrkin Fellowship in the Humanities. He is in Israel for several weeks researching the religious-secular gap in Israeli society.

Even the Western Wall, the symbol and focus of Judaism's hopes for national revival and where people from all walks of life gather to pray, has seen passions boil over and has been the scene of intra-communal strife in Jerusalem in recent times.

Finding the centre of Jewish life

Lately we have been bombarded with articles bewailing the loss of Israel as the centre of Jewish life – as well as laments for the decline of the synagogue, the real centre of Jewish life; scorn for making anti-Semitism or the Holocaust the centre of Jewish life; concern over the demolition of the Jewish family, the centre of Jewish life; and panic over cuts to Jewish education, the centre of Jewish life. You get the idea. So where, you asked, is the centre of Jewish life?

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

After all, if we don't know what the wellspring of Jewishness is, how can we halt the perceived decline in Jewish values and the rise of assimilation – catchwords that tug at the communal heartstrings every year at budget time?

All over North America during the High Holy Days, synagogue presidents and rabbis will claim that the shul is the centre of Jewish life and needs our support and that of our children (many of whom are hanging out with their friends near the front door of the synagogue and will therefore miss the sermon). Soon through the mail will come membership renewal notices for community centres that proclaim themselves the centre for Jewish life in the community. Israelis travelling on behalf of many good causes in the promised land will remind us poor misguided Diaspora Jews that Israel, the centre of our Jewish hearts, still needs our dollars if not our bodies.

Of course many will argue that Torah-true Judaism is the centre of Jewish life, all 613 laws and uncounted minhagim; however, those claiming this will not all agree on what constitutes Torah Judaism. We can have a variety (some hostile to each other) from which to choose. Across the floor from the Torah Jews will be the devout secularists, for whom religion is irrelevant if not damaging. For them, Jewish history and culture, the ethic factor, is the centre of Jewish identity.

David Hartman, on a visit to Vancouver some years ago, tried to describe what he believed were the two most critical formative factors of modern Jewish life. For him they were the Emancipation of European Jews and the founding of the State of Israel. Members of the audience were horrified.

How could he, how did he dare, ignore the Holocaust and its destruction of European Jewry? It was a powerful moment for me. I realized that as we Jews could not agree on what has shaped us today; so we would remain at the mercy of emotional claims for our attention. Instead of a calm, rational debate over the importance of these three events – Emancipation, Holocaust, modern Israel – the evening became an impassioned defence of one or more as the deciding factor in shaping our identity.

We must distinguish here between what shapes us as individual Jews and what creates or damages our existence as a Jewish community. Our individual identities, it seems to me, can be only determined by the way we experience Jewishness in the smallest things – here it can be family, a friend, a role model, plus the way we react to the facts of Jewish history and contemporary events. For those who experienced the Holocaust first-hand, either as survivors or as observers, the experience is visceral. That generation cannot help but react to the emotional power that the Holocaust evokes. For today's youth, the experience will be much more intellectual. They will have to learn the experience and to develop emotional reactions affected by their own personal road-map. Is the Holocaust less central to their individual Jewish identity? I believe it is. Is that bad? No, it is just a fact of time and distance.

But the Holocaust or the rebirth of a modern Jewish state are factors that shape our communal reaction to world events, not always thoughtfully. A journalist who lends credence to Holocaust denial will arouse in us fierce communal anger, even though there might be a much more dangerous, more subtle threat in the absence of a well thought-out high school curriculum unit on genocide.

Or take another case: aliyah from North America to Israel. Israeli public spokespeople alternately decry the lack of aliyah from North America and proclaim their superiority to North American Jewish life and then prophesy its demise. Why they would want such a bunch of "wusses" and misfits in their country is a bit mystifying sometimes, but no matter. If as a community we believe and act as if our Jewish life here in Canada is inauthentic and weak, then it will eventually be so.

I don't suggest a way to resolve the question of the centre of Jewish life. But I do ask that we continually examine our assumptions about the centre, keeping in mind the many.

A national disgrace

The May issue of Homemaker's magazine featured an article by renowned social activist June Callwood.

The sub-headline proclaims: "How come almost a million and a half children go to school hungry in one of the richest countries in the world?" It quotes Statistics Canada, which says that nearly 1.5 million Canadian children, or one of every five under age 18, live in poverty. We have to go back to the Great Depression to find this level of social disintegration, more shocking because it comes at a time of growing prosperity.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Somehow we seem to think that fixing the problem is too expensive. But poverty – especially child poverty – is even more expensive. According to the article, studies show that "they become the heaviest users of hospitals, prisons, courts, drug and alcohol programs, police services, hostels, subsidized housing and welfare."

Callwood goes on to say: "This is not to suggest that poverty equates with joblessness and crime, because it doesn't. Rich people can, and do, raise problem kids, while adversity very frequently produces quiet heroes who rise above their unpromising beginnings to live exemplary lives. But being poor certainly stacks the cards: the stress of hunger, anxiety, envy and hoplessness cracks many a young soul, and makes children ill." The federal government is not unaware of the problem, but the latest budget has not made provision for these children.

Some 20 major national organizations have, however, banded together from across the country and community groups have become part of Campaign 2000, a drive to bring the issue to the attention of the Canadian public. But while Ottawa has given notice that it is aware of so many children living in stress and distress, the Ontario government has given little indication of any similar concern.

It is therefore heartening to know that a group of Jewish religious leaders – first sparked by an announcement of Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld of Temple Emanu-El in Toronto – have made radical proposals. Rabbi Bielfeld, in a letter to his congregation, suggested that people who benefit by the Ontario tax cut should donate the money saved to organizations that help disadvantaged children. Some will not be able to do this, but others will.

There is a popular notion that individuals have no voice in matters such as these. Callwood speaks of this when she says: "If you want child poverty in this country to end, you have to tell elected officials at every level how you feel and that you won't vote for anyone who doesn't agree that child poverty is a national disgrace…Canada's children have a right to a decent standard of living. They have the right to a level of dignity and respect, and hope for the future. Their poverty is every citizen's shame."

Our Jewish people, with an enviable record of giving tzedakah, will say amen, and I am happy to acknowledge that some of them are in the leadership of arousing our national conscience to this burning issue and have designated Oct. 17 to 18 as Children's Shabbat.

Help for the meeting-addicted

By SHEL KRAKOFSKY

There have been significant meetings such as the first Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland, in 1897, and the 1656 meeting in Amsterdam that excommunicated the philosopher Baruch Spinoza.

By Shel Krakofsky in London

This is not to exclude the marathon sisterhood meeting that took 10 hours to decide if it would be Mrs. Epstein and not Mrs. Horowitz who would present a bouquet to the guest speaker at their annual installation dinner. (Mrs. Horowitz understandably tendered her resignation and immediately joined another shul, where she is currently finishing her first term as chair of flowers.)

Ever since Moses was commanded to build a Tent of Meeting, the Ohel Moayd in the wilderness, we have been getting together more often than atoms in a physics laboratory. The ancient tribes were encamped in the form of a quadrilateral around the Tent of Meeting, the precursor of the modern community centre.

No matter our affiliations, interpretations and practices, what we do share with the ancients is our penchant for meetings. Today it is easier to get a quorum for a meeting than it is to get a minyan for prayer.

Some people need meetings as much as they need air, food and shelter. With nothing to attend, these people may be seen walking the streets or sitting alone as they sweat, twitch and hallucinate – classic symptoms of addiction and withdrawal.

If there is no imminent meeting, these people are forced to suffer at home and have even been known to graciously accept phone calls from telemarketers.

Aside from the number of meetings these addicts attend, there are telltale signs if somebody is falling into the morass of the meeting addicted: They carry a pocket edition of Robert's Rules of Order. They are on speaking terms with anybody else who owns a copy of Robert's Rules of Order. In restaurants, they ask for the minutes instead of the menu, selecting their meal using the phrase, "Point of order."

So desperate are some people for meetings that if there are none, these folks form new organizations, invent new crises and have even met secretly incorporating themselves as numbered companies. Instead of doing anything, the motto of these diehards is, "Strike a committee!"

There is no doubt in my mind that it was Jews who invented the football huddle.

Family life, already decimated and threatened on all fronts by innumerable factors, is not being helped by these endless rounds of meetings. The following statements are part of meeting addicted households: Forget dinner, I'm going to a meeting…Not tonight dear, I'm on a committee.

Trying to help these unfortunate souls is extremely difficult. The old bromides don't work. Telling these people, for example, to take time to smell the roses, to tend your own garden, that charity begins at home — none of this works — not even insulting them with the famous reminder that a camel is a horse designed by a committee. These people have come to adore camels.

What is needed is something dramatically different. Something with a proven track record on the addiction front. And that is a 12-step program for withdrawal.

These get-togethers are totally anonymous at publicly undisclosed places. There is no shame and the atmosphere is one of understanding, not judgment. Just as alcoholics, drug users and gamblers have successfully overcome their habits, so too can those in our community who won't refuse a meeting.

In addition, video cassettes could be produced to teach these people how to do crossword puzzles and play solitaire. There could even be a hotline linked to a bunch of malcontents and misanthropes, who are members of nothing and have never attended a meeting of any kind.

So if you think you or any of your friends or loved ones could be helped by such a program, organize a group soon. By simply uttering the phrase to the assembled, "Hello, my name is Moses [or whoever] and I am addicted to meetings," the beginning to recovery has begun.

The withdrawal will be difficult but it will be cushioned. There will still be meetings.

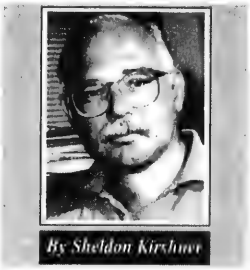
Australian novelist David Malouf a late bloomer

Call him, if you like, a late bloomer.

David Malouf, hailed as one of Australia's finest novelists, did not write his first novel until he was 41. But in the past two decades, Malouf, 63, has made up for lost time, having produced an impressive body of work — novels, short stories, poems, a play and a memoir — that has earned him universal praise at home and abroad.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Malouf's last book, Remembering Babylon (1993), was short listed for Britain's prestigious Booker Prize, and his current novel, The Conversations At Curlow Creek, has been described as "memorable" and "brilliant" by the New York Times.

A descendant on his mother's side of a Jewish boxing champion, he is frankly surprised by his success. "There is no way you could predict it," he said in a conversation recently while in Toronto for a Harbourfront reading. "You don't know how your work will be taken."

A former supply teacher and university lecturer in English literature, Malouf has always been drawn to the written word. But, as he pointed out in his cautious, reticent manner, "it took longer to get it into publishable prose.

"You don't know what's there until you risk putting it down on paper," he added. "You have to be patient and persistent."

Malouf broke into print in 1962 with a volume of poetry. But more than a decade would elapse before he tested himself as a novelist. "We all have a view of the world and what it means, and fiction is often a way of exploring it and finding out what life is all about and what puzzles and disturbs you," he explained.

Born in Brisbane, Malouf studied English, French, Latin and philosophy at the University of Queensland, and left Australia in 1959, bound for Britain, seeking to expose himself to new influences.

When he gave up teaching in 1978, Malouf had written two novels, one of which, An Imaginary Life, launched him. He bought a house in Italy and immersed himself in his budding career. "I had to find out how many more books I could write," he said. "By isolating myself, I found out what I had to write."

Thematically, Malouf's novels, which are set in Australia, deal with such questions as nature and justice, reason and unreason, order and disorder, fate, survival and the force of love. Fountain pen in hand, he spends about two hours a day writing, reserving the rest of it for reflection. On average, he produces 500 words per session, constantly polishing his drafts. "Thomas Mann once said that a writer finds it difficult to write, and that's true."

A resident of Sydney, Australia today, Malouf is uncertain whether his novels have been influenced by his ethnic background.

His mother's Sephardi family settled in England during the Cromwell period in the 17th century. One of her forebears, the illustrious pugilist Daniel Mendoza (1764-1836), was inducted into the Boxing Hall of Fame about a century after his death.

Malouf's mother, Welcome, left England as a girl. She married George Malouf, a Lebanese Melkite whose father immigrated to Australia in the 1880s. Welcome and George raised their son as a Catholic, but he is not a practicing Christian. "I'm not very interested in the orthodoxies of any religion."

Still, he is intrigued by his Jewish lineage and by Mendoza, and notes that his collection of short stories, Antipodes, contains a number of Jewish characters, among them Holocaust survivors.

Malouf, whose stories have been translated into 12 languages, including Arabic and Chinese, is on the verge of starting a new novel. "I have an idea for something, but I don't know if I'll run with it. You don't want to leap too quickly."

Saga of Mischa Weisbord

David Vaisbord met his legendary uncle, Mischa Weisbord, in New York City in 1967 when he was all of six years old.

"We took an immediate liking to one another," recalled Vaisbord. "He picked me up, set me on his knee and told the greatest jokes I had ever heard. He was tall, handsome, fit and incredibly charismatic. He seemed like Superman."

By then, Vaisbord had heard hundreds of stories about this mythic figure. As a budding violinist, Weisbord had been a child prodigy, a wunderkind who had been favorably compared with Paganini. It seemed as if his protean talents would propel him to the pinnacle of fame.

"He had the training and the technique to have been on a par with the world's greatest concert violinists," observed his nephew. Instead, Weisbord squandered the promise of his youth.

In 1991, when he died in a Brooklyn rooming house, Weisbord was alone and forgotten, having been living on welfare and food stamps for years.

Now, six years after his death, Vaisbord, an independent filmmaker from Vancouver, has made a poignant documentary about Weisbord. Produced by the National Film Board of Canada in association with the Canadian Broadcast Corporation and in cooperation with Vision TV, Mischa was recently shown at the Canadian International Documentary Film Festival in Toronto.

Clearly a labor of love, the 44-minute movie traces the trajectory of Weisbord's life from his birth in Russia in 1907 to his tragic decline.

Weisbord, guided by his domineering father, was a virtuoso. His teacher, Leopold Auer, no minor violinist himself, recognized his genius. Weisbord impressed audiences and critics alike. When he was 20, he was due to embark on a tour of the United States. The plan fell through; his parents' marriage collapsed; his father — his indispensable manager — died.

Shattered by his father's passing, Weisbord went to Sweden, then to Israel and, finally, to the United States. Feeling unappreciated in Stockholm and Tel Aviv, he looked to New York City as his one last chance to redeem himself. He failed, having been reduced to playing at weddings and giving lessons.

"His temperament was his major flaw," explained Vaisbord, who travelled the world to acquire the funding for Mischa. "He was extremely volatile and not accepting of people's foibles. He would not play with an orchestra. He wanted to do only solos."

Considered an incorrigible eccentric, Weisbord retreated into himself, becoming something of a recluse. "He was a very, very strange man," said Vaisbord, who saw him last in 1980. "He had no life skills and couldn't take care of himself." Worse still, he was incapable of working with others.

Using a metaphor to describe him, Vaisbord said, "He was like a violin, his father having been the only person who ever knew how to play him. That was Mischa's tragedy."

When his body was discovered, Weisbord had already been dead for at least a week. "He had no close friends or acquaintances to check up on him. The violin was his only real friend, the only true love of his life."

With Mischa, Vaisbord feels as if an immense burden has been lifted from his shoulder. "Someone," he said, "had to tell his story once and for all."

JIAS eases teenagers' transition to a new world

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Get 'em while they're young.

That's the philosophy behind a novel new project initiated by Toronto's Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS).

Launched last spring, the Jewish Immigrant Teen Program seeks to bring together young and recent emigres from the former Soviet Union to get them involved in the Jewish community and make them feel comfortable in it.

It used to be that JIAS set its sights on immigrant parents, facilitating job searches, accommodation and overall settlement. Now, the agency is also focusing on those at a particularly vulnerable age, trying to ease their transition to a strange new world.

The program, run jointly between JIAS, the Bathurst Jewish Centre and B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO), is funded by the Jewish Continuity Task Force, one of whose mandates was to stanch the rising tide of assimilation.

Thus, Jewish programming is stressed for young newcomers from the former Soviet republics, where Jewish identity and education may not have been strong.

Program director Ziva Shmorgun, an intake worker at JIAS, says the 12 active members (more are being sought), aged 16 to 18, have become fast friends and have helped one another acclimatize to life in Canada. They meet weekly to plan programs and outings.

All the members have been here for less than five years. Some came directly from the former Soviet Union, while others lived in Israel for a while. The "veterans" help the newest arrivals, Shmorgun says.

Programs have included a Yom Ha'atzmaut dance party at the BJC, attended by about 50 teens, and a pool barbeque to introduce members to BBYO. Next week, a trip to the klezmer festival at Harbourfront is planned.

"Our long-term goal," says Shmorgun, "is to introduce young Jewish immigrants to the Jewish community, and to help them feel comfortable." Eventually, she would like to see an entire BBYO chapter composed solely of immigrant teens.

And now that the school year is around the corner, the program wants participants to hook up with on-campus Jewish groups.

With roughly 25,000 Soviet-Jewish families in Metro, about half of whom arrived after 1987, there's a great need for this kind of service, Shmorgun notes.

Says member Artur Palvanov, 17, a native of Tashkent and who lived in Israel for seven years, "I've made a lot of friends because of this program. I feel at home."

Urban Alliance head urges black/Jewish talk

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Relations between blacks and Jews in Toronto are not as bad as some media coverage suggests, according to Bob Katz, new president of the Urban Alliance on Race Relations.

"Extremists on both sides make statements which are given a lot of play, but I don't see black-Jewish conflicts on a day-to-day basis," said Katz.

The Urban Alliance is one of the few forums in which Jews and blacks come together, he said. There are Jews on the board of the Alliance and it is in touch with representative groups in the Jewish community. He urged more communication between the two groups.

In some situations where Jewish-black conflicts have arisen, Katz said it is unfortunate that moderate leaders in the black community have not spoken up.

One of the important goals for the Alliance is to have ongoing discussions with the police about violence directed towards blacks.

"This is a problem that won't go away," he said. "There are too many shootings of blacks by police. We're pretty distressed about that."

The Alliance is also "very concerned" about the disproportionate number of minorities who end up in jail compared with the total number of people who are arrested.

Personally, Katz said, he favors a new employment equity bill which focuses more on results than procedures, is more selective in its targets and does not allow firms to achieve their targets by hiring people who don't need help.

However, he said, there is still debate among Alliance members about what kind of a new employment equity bill should replace the one cancelled by Premier Mike Harris.

A member of Darchei Noam Reconstructionist Synagogue, Katz, 52, a social worker, is rehabilitation director of Vocational Rehabilitation Associates. His wife, Giuliana, is a professor of Italian at the University of Toronto. They have two children, Reva, 25, a social worker, and Alessandra, 15.

USDS AWARD WINNERS

United Synagogue Day School recently announced three major award winners. The Schecter Scholar in Israel Award for professional development in Israel was presented to Bracha Sabari (left), a Judaic studies elementary school teacher at the Richmond Hill campus, and Channa Sargon (right), a Judaic studies grade 3 teacher at the Bayview campus. Both educators participated in summer seminars offered by the Joint Authority for Jewish Zionist Education in the Diaspora. The other award winner is Stacey Wintre (inset), who won the Dr. Aaron N. Nussbaum Award for graduates of USDS who have demonstrated commitment to Jewish education, leadership and to the community. She will pursue her studies in the Rothberg School's One Year Program at the Hebrew University.

Association offers programs geared to Jewish deaf

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Alan Cheifetz, president of the Toronto chapter of the Jewish Association of the Deaf has no idea how many deaf Jews live in Toronto.

"We have 40 or 50 members, but many Jewish deaf people have never heard of us — many are totally unconnected to the Jewish community and it is difficult for us to spread the word," he says.

Cheifetz, 38, who works for the federal government and also works part time teaching hearing parents how to sign with their deaf children, has been president of the association since January. He joined 10 years ago because he was anxious to be involved in both the Jewish and the deaf communities.

"We need to have all cultures represented in the Jewish community," he says. "Too many deaf Jews hide themselves at home. They are lonely, only because they can't experience what we are able to give."

Although the association, under the umbrella of the Jewish Deaf Congress, a North American organization, has been around for over 50 years, it only started to gather steam in Toronto in 1987 and now meets monthly in members' homes.

"We sponsor workshops, speakers and arrange for High Holy Day services."

He praises Rabbi Elyse Goldstein who has, on occasion, arranged for services with an interpreter for the group. Some Reform congregations have interpreters at their High Holy Day services.

"That began when one member of Temple Kol Ami became upset because there was no way for him to understand the service," he says.

The association hosted its first retreat in the spring and members are encouraged by its success. "We ran various activities that allowed participants to learn more about Jewish life and culture — we are trying to raise awareness of our religion. For the fall, we are planning a Jewish life course run specifically for the deaf. We are trying hard to get people involved."

A conference of the Jewish Deaf Congress is set for California in 1998 and Cheifetz says his group is aiming to have the conference of 2004 in Toronto.

"We had one here in 1994 and it attracted over 250 people." he says.

He concedes, however, that, as with all service groups, money is the "eternal problem. We have a charitable number and we are trying to raise money through such activities as bingos, casinos and strawberry festivals. This money goes towards our newsletter, workshops and sending delegates to the convention. We are also hoping to start up a scholarship that will go towards sending Jewish deaf youth to school. We want to help these kids become community leaders.

"We encourage new members, young and old, and we welcome new ideas. We need to teach hearing people about our culture and we urge them to get involved with us."

For information on the Toronto Association of the Jewish Deaf call Bell Relay at 1-800-855-0511 and ask for TTY 416-973-1302 or 905-881-9704.

Deputy PM helps cheder celebrate bar mitzvah

VAUGHAN — The bar mitzvah party lacked a bar mitzvah boy, but it did feature Canada's deputy prime minister.

Herb Gray was on hand last week to lend best wishes to the Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad, which is marking its 13th year of operations.

"Mazal tov!" Gray said in his toast to the school at a dinner at Congregation Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto in Thornhill. "I salute Cheder Chabad on its bar mitzvah."

The annual dinner and ticket draw was attended by about 400 spirited supporters of Chabad and held in memory of Rabbi Yaakov Gluckowsky, a beloved leader in Toronto's Chabad community until his death in 1995.

Rabbi Gluckowsky, who had taught at Eitz Chaim Day School and elsewhere, was praised by former students and friends as a shining example of Lubavitch tenets. His son, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Gluckowsky of Rehovot, who serves as assistant chief justice of Israel's Chabad beit din, gave a stirring and heartfelt tribute to his late father.

Rabbi Yaakov Gluckowsky's sisters and other children were also on hand for the tribute.

Toronto philanthropist Leslie Dan, who has lent his name to many Jewish causes, presented Gray, his one-time University of Toronto classmate, with the cheder's National Leadership Award.

In his remarks, Gray recalled how in 1995, the school's choir performed at a Chanukah menorah-lighting ceremony at Rideau Hall before Governor General Romeo LeBlanc.

"They exemplified the work of Chabad," Gray said, going on to praise the cheder for imparting to its students "13 years of intellectual and spiritual development."

The audience wished Gray a refuah shlemah for his ongoing battle against cancer.

Also in attendance was Elinor Caplan, the new member of Parliament for Thornhill riding.

The cheder's executive director, Rabbi Yona Shur, reported that the evening raised $233,000, or nearly a quarter of the annual operating budget.

The cheder opened with eight students in 1984 on Edinburgh Drive in Downsview and now enrols 125 pupils from kindergarten through Grade 8. It's housed in Thornhill's Chabad headquarters, with some classes at Beth Avraham Yoseph. A mesivta (high school) was launched last year.

Rabbi Shur said the goal of the school's fundraising campaign is to unite all classes under one roof, somewhere in Thornhill.

In 1988, the school assumed its current name in memory of Shmuel Zahavy, who had been a student there until his tragic death in an accident earlier that year.

Israeli teens to perform

TORONTO — The Israel Scout Friendship Caravan is holding its annual community performance at Mel Lastman Square on Aug. 25, at 7:30 p.m.

The Friendship Caravan, composed of 10 Israeli teenagers, uses song and dance to showcase its message of friendship, culture and peace from Israel. The audience participates in the interactive program.

Hundreds of candidates nominated by their peers, compete for the honor to participate in the caravan. During the summer they travel through communities and summer camps from coast-to-coast in Canada and the United States.

The caravan is part of the larger Israel Scout Delegation, whose members serve as councillors in camps and communities throughout North America. Its mission, a national project of the Scouts of Israel, is to create a bridge of friendship between Israeli and North American youth.

The visit of the Friendship Caravan is co-sponsored by the Jewish Advisory Committee on Scouting and Guiding and United Israel Appeal of Canada Inc.

Everyone is welcome to the concert and admission is free.

You can give him a label or you can give him help. Wherever you stand on the debate about religion in Israel, he's not the enemy. Don't make UJA Federation and other Jewish charities the battlefield. Your support for UJA Federation is among the most forceful statements you can make about Jewish unity. Rescuing the imperiled and caring for the vulnerable are still the best ways to strengthen the entire Jewish community. UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN 98 READY TO ROLL

In less than a week, UJA Federation will launch its 1998 annual campaign with a campaign kick-off on Monday, August 25, 8:00 p.m. at The Ford Centre for the Performing Arts.

The event will officially open UJA Federation's annual fundraising drive which raised $35.5 million last year.

"All the elements are in place for a successful campaign," notes Lawrence Bloomberg, who is co-chairing the launch with Carol Kassel. "The greater sense of economic security among our contributors will benefit campaign and those who depend on UJA Federation for help."

Funding priorities this year include financial assistance for the poor, increased support for supplementary Jewish education, the expansion of hospice services and improved counselling for battered women and victims of child abuse.

Campaign Chairman Leo Goldhar and Vice-Chairs David Engel and Glennie Lindenberg are also asking the community to keep in mind the Jewish Agency's work in rescuing Jews from unstable parts of the world. This year some 60,000 Jewish men, women and children will be brought to Israel from the former Soviet Union.

If you and your family haven't registered yet for the campaign launch, there's still time to show your support for community and enjoy an exciting evening featuring renowned singer/songwriter Amy Sky, who starred in the Toronto theatre hit Blood Brothers, and Israeli recording artists Hashavim.

"It's very encouraging to see such a strong show of support from the community on behalf of people who really need help," says Campaign Chairman Leo Goldhar. "This demonstration of commitment and strength reverberates throughout the community at large and instills tremendous pride in us all."

"The energy and spirit that radiates throughout the evening makes everyone in attendance feel like they're part of something very special," adds Kassel. "It's a very motivational event that sets the momentum for the rest of campaign."

Tickets cost $18 in advance and $20 at the door. Seating is limited. To order tickets call (416) 631-5700.

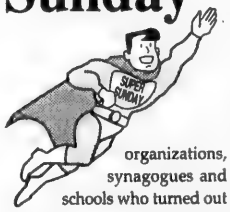
Calling community on Super Sunday



The countdown for UJA Federation's largest one day fundraising event has begun.

Next month hundreds of volunteers will be calling thousands of community members asking for their campaign support on Super Sunday, September 14.

Each year the day long telethon blitz raises more than $2 million dollars to fund the extensive network of social and human services supported by UJA Federation on behalf of Jews in need. More than 700 campaigners made close to 40,000 calls last year during Super Sunday and Super Week.

The first of the four three-hour shifts begins at 9:00 a.m. and the calls don't stop until 9:00 p.m. or until the last dedicated campaigner leaves. Throughout the day volunteers are kept energized by live entertainment, special visits from community leaders and local celebrities and plenty of snacks.

Jeff Cohen, who is co-chairing Super Sunday with past UJA Federation Women's Campaign Chair Vicki Campbell, expects to double the number of representatives from companies, organizations, synagogues and schools who turned out last year in "a tremendous show of community support."

"Seeing the diverse elements of the community coming together for one cause gives campaigners a real boost," adds Cohen.

Since this is the last year of the Three Year Vision which secured gifts from many contributors until the 1999 campaign, there's more time to acquire new donations. Approximately one third of UJA Federation donors subscribed to the Three Year Vision launched in 1995.

Vicki Campbell's message is straight to the point. "Be ready to commit when that phone rings." Campbell says she's "proud to be offering the Jewish community the opportunity to give tzedakah and help others."

If you would like to join hundreds of other community volunteers on Super Sunday, call (416) 635-2883 ext 115.

A couple of callers. Hilary and Allan Rabie lend their support and phone skills on Super Sunday last year.

Campaign to address urgent needs

Urgent communal needs are the driving force behind UJA Federation's 1998 Campaign.

As government cut backs continue to leave funding shortfalls in a wide array of social and human services, UJA Federation is intensifying its efforts to find the resources to preserve what makes Toronto's Jewish community one of the most admired in North America.

Some of the more pressing needs include financial assistance for the poor, which could face a shortfall of nearly $300,000 this year, the Jewish Hospice Program which provides care for the dying and support for their families and counselling for victims of women and child abuse.

Programs to preserve Jewish identity are also taking top priority. More funds are needed to enhance supplementary school education, campus programming and support of Jewish summer camps in the former Soviet Union. For just $50,000, nearly 250 youngsters can benefit from a special experience of Jewish discovery at a Russian summer camp.

"Our children are our future," asserts Alan Sandler, Vice President of Community Planning and Allocations at UJA Federation. "If we fail to invest in them today their Jewishness will be lost forever."

Although more than 800,000 Jews have been rescued from the danger and uncertainty of the former Soviet Union, many more people face a future of instability and insecurity. This year alone, the Jewish Agency will bring 60,000 more Jews from the FSU to Israel.

"The work of the Jewish Agency remains vitally important," stresses Campaign Chair Leo Goldhar. "Those people are counting on us."

Economy picture perfect for Campaign

UJA Federation Campaign Chairman Leo Goldhar believes a stronger economy and changes in tax laws will have a positive effect on community giving this year.

"People feel more confident and more secure than they did a few years ago," notes Goldhar, "and that translates into people feeling more comfortable about opening their hearts and wallets to charity."

Recent federal budget changes which improve tax deductions for charitable giving have already benefitted UJA Federation. "Some of our contributors have donated stocks and bonds and other assets, allowing them to realize a significant tax savings," explains Goldhar.

Goldhar hopes the improved economic climate and new tax incentives will lead to a 15% increase in gifts to the annual campaign, which raised $35.5 million last year. Goldhar would also like to attract 2,000 new donors this year to complement 3,000 who joined the UJA Federation family last year. "Our goal is to reach 5,000 new gifts by the end of campaign.

It would be nice to stop playing catch-up each year and start investing in much needed new programs and services which require new money."

But Goldhar doesn't base his optimism on economics alone.

"The more people learn about all the ways UJA Federation helps people the more they'll want to pitch in and help," he asserts.

UJA Federation, through its beneficiary agencies, provides financial assistance to the Jewish poor, and supports an extensive Jewish education network, services for seniors and programs to preserve Jewish identity, especially among the young. Since 1989, the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency has rescued more than 800,000 Jews from turmoil in the former Soviet Union and brought them to Israel. Thousands of Jewish men, women and children in the FSU are currently preparing for a fresh start in Israel.

"It's Jews helping other Jews whether here at home or thousands of miles away," remarks Goldhar. "It's about helping those who are unable to help themselves."

"We are a small Jewish community in terms of our global presence and we must stick together to have the necessary strength to prevent the 30s and 40s from ever happening again."

PERSON TO PERSON

Himel finds comfortable fit with UJA Federation

Person to Person is a regular column in Community Matters profiling members of the community who, in addition to succeeding personally and professionally, have enhanced their Jewish identity and commitment to community through their involvement with UJA Federation.

Alison Himel

As head of a $1.5 million a year foam manufacturing firm, Alison Himel claims her ability to say "no" is one of the company's most valuable assets. But it's UJA Federation that gained a valuable asset when Alison said "yes" to chairing the organization's ATID program.

Himel, who heads this unique leadership development program for children of leading supporters with Gil Palter, says she couldn't refuse the position when her uncle, past Campaign Chairman David Goldstein, asked her to come on board.

"I knew very little about what UJA Federation did," recalls Himel, "and I saw this as the perfect opportunity to learn more."

Himel, 32, also felt she could identify with many other community members her age who were only marginally knowledgeable about the work UJA Federation does. "I was the perfect target."

The group, which meets roughly six times a year, is primarily focused on educating its 40 or so members about UJA Federation, its beneficiary agencies and the work performed by the Jewish Agency around the world. Highlights have included briefings from Jewish Agency Chairman Avrum Burg and Jerusalem Report Managing Editor David Horovitz and an exercise to familiarize the group with UJA Federation's budget allocations process.

"We were able to really wrap our minds around some important issues," says Himel. "It was a great way to learn about the community."

When she's not planning programs for ATID, Himel is busy at Vitafoam's Concord, Ontario factory doing "a little bit of everything." Although educated and professionally trained in marketing, Himel concedes that "running a small business means there's nothing you don't do."

The company, which was founded as a family business, sells $1.5 million worth of foam health care products a year to mostly Canadian firms. "Streamlining production, securing more reliable suppliers and better pricing," says Himel have led to the company's first profitable year.

When a big order comes in Himel can even be found on the factory floor operating the shrink-wrap machine. "It's the only machine my co-workers will let me go near."

Bronfman fellow Shapero returns to York

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Judith Shapero just can't stay away from York University. A 1996 graduate of York's Jewish Teacher Education program who taught Hebrew language and Jewish studies at United Synagogue Day School last year, she has returned to her alma mater to take on a dual role as part of a 10-month Bronfman Yozma fellowship.

Shapero, 24, will divide her time between York's Centre for Jewish Studies, where she will conduct research in Jewish Education, and Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) – the umbrella organization for Jewish student groups on campus – through which she will be involved in outreach and informal Jewish education.

Shapero loves studying Judaism and hopes to inspire others to "take their Judaism seriously" as well. A graduate of Associated Hebrew Day Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto with an impressive list of academic awards, she once thought of pursuing a career in science, but her heart wasn't in it as it was with Jewish education.

The turning point came after her first year of university, when she studied for a year at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, including a course with the late renowned scholar Nehama Leibowitz. "That was a once-in-a-lifetime experience," said Shapero.

Through JCS she plans to establish and teach in an informal Beit Midrash program on campus, starting at York University.

Her first program will probably be a three-session course on the Role of the Teacher, using traditional Jewish sources ranging from the Torah to medieval texts to modern responsa.

"I like seeing students engage with the text, challenge it and demand from it," said Shapero. "When students argue with the text and challenge it, it means they're taking it seriously. That's real. I don't find it blasphemous. They want to make it relevant and meaningful to themselves."

Also in the offing are study sessions for women, and the incorporation of an educational component into some existing Jewish Student Federation programs at York.

Shapero has long been involved in informal education. Among the involvements listed on her resume are stints as a United Synagogue Youth adviser at Beth Tikvah Synagogue and as a special needs counsellor at Camp Reena. She also co-chaired the Jewish Education Students' Association in her last year at York.

"We're very excited about Judith working on campus," said Zac Kaye, executive director of JCS. "She will be a tremendous role model for women and will be developing some new initiatives on campus."

Judith Shapero

Through Shapero's work, Kaye looks forward to JCS and York's Centre for Jewish Studies developing "an even closer relationship" as partner agencies.

There has been collaboration over the years, confirmed Alex Pomson, professor of Jewish Education and coordinator of York's Jewish Teacher Education program, but "both parties have always been looking for ways to develop it further."

He sees Shapero's fellowship at York as "a very exciting development" and credits the Bronfman Foundation for providing opportunities both for young people and Jewish organizations.

The Bronfman Yozma fellowships were launched in 1995 to fund eight full-time Jewish community positions annually. Shapero is the first Canadian Yozma fellow. The word yozma is Hebrew for "resourceful initiative."

Among the academic projects with which Shapero will be involved is a study of how young people think about Jewish history, and the way their concepts change following study of Jewish history in an academic setting.

Another project, like the first a brainchild of Pomson, will focus on the complex role of the classroom teacher.

With her love of learning, research and teaching, Shapero sees the Yozma fellowship as an excellent opportunity to explore her interests. "I want to really contribute to Jewish studies and the Jewish community in any way I can."

גידי קורן וחברים

"גשר הירקון" הוא מושג היסטורי בישראל. עד שבנו עכשיו גישרון קטן להעביר את ספרטאי המכביה והוא קרס פתאום באות "אלף" וגרם למותם של יהודים אוסטראליים חמים ואוהבי ישראל. לו היה קורס באות "בית" היה האסון נופל על משפחות בבלגיה, ובאות "קוף" - בקנדה. וזה כל כך סימבולי שמה שייזכר מהמכביה שנועדה להיות גשר בין ישראל לגולה, הוא גשר קטן על הירקון. ועוד אסוציאציה עצובה: כשהיינו ילדים בתל אביב, הזהירו אותנו שלא לטבול במי הירקון שיש בהם בילהרציה ושאר חיידקים, ורק המתאבדים שביננו "בתיכון חדש" העזו, בעיקר כדי להרשים את הבנות. ועכשיו נפטרו מספר אתלטים מאוסטרליה מסיבוכים זיהומיים מן המים המטונפים ששאפו לריאותיהם. עוד לא המציאו אנטיביוטיקה מספיק חזקה להילחם במי הירקון.

Parshat Ekev suggests dignity, respect for others

By RABBI RONALD WEISS

Now that Tisha b'Av is over, we begin to involve ourselves in a new, yet annual task.

Last Shabbat, we read a special haftorah — so special, in fact , that the very day itself is given a unique name. Shabbat Nachamu, the Sabbath of Consolation, signifies that the mourning and sense of sadness of Tisha b'Av, with which we have worked to generate and fill our days of summer, are truly over. Today, with the arrival of Parshat Ekev, the mood evoked by the reading of the Torah seems, to me, to be substantially different.

Parshat Ekev has long been used by rabbis and homiliticians as source material for the High Holy Days. It's rich in describing those ethical teachings that resonate deep within the Jewish heart and have been effective at stimulating our people to do tshuvah, to repent and strive to improve themselves as well as their relationship with the Almighty.

As an example of the wealth found within this parshah, let me cite just one source. We are told "Now, O Israel, what does the Lord, your G-d, ask of you? Only to fear the Lord, your G-d, to follow in His ways and to love Him and to serve the Lord, your G-d, with all your heart and with all your soul." (Deuteronomy 10:12) While the next verse explains that this is to be performed by the observance of G-d's commandments that are ultimately for our benefit, often people need specific instruction as to how this is to be accomplished. Perhaps a brief example will illustrate what I mean.

Maimonides, in his commentary on the Mishnah, discusses the teaching found in Pirke Avot (1:6) that says, "V'he'vay dan et kol ha-adam l'kaf zechut," "Judge every person favorably." Maimonides explains that this means "if there is an individual who you do not know to be either righteous or wicked, and you see this person doing something that might be interpreted either favorably or unfavorably, interpret his actions as being for good and do not suspect him of doing evil."

Rav Yehuda Aryeh Leib Alter of Gur, in his understanding of this Mishnah, provides very clear and specific instructions as to how this is to be done. He translates the phrase "kol ha-adam" with a different emphasis than Maimonides. Whereas Maimonides understood this to mean "every person," which is the usual translation, Rav Alter interprets "kol ha-adam" as meaning "the whole of the person." Thus, according to Rav Alter, the Mishnah teaches us to "Judge the whole of the person favorably." Do not look at only the individual's faults when you judge him. Rather look at the whole of the person and you will certainly see good in him to judge him favorably.

As we begin to approach the High Holy Day season with the ethics stressed in Parshat Ekev, let us all remember that to follow in G-d's ways, to love the Almighty and seek to serve Him with our hearts and souls means treating each other with dignity and respect. Truly seeing "the whole" of each other will enable us to overlook one another's faults. This will permit us to judge each other favorably.

The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara*, by David Kertzer (Random House of Canada, $35)

On the night of June 23, 1858, Edgardo Mortara, six-years-old, the son of a Jewish family in Bologna, Italy, was abducted by papal police. He was taken to the Dominican House of Catechumens in Rome to be instructed in the principles of the Catholic faith. The explanation of the Church was that a domestic servant of the Mortara family had secretly baptized the child six years earlier when she thought he was about to die — and that such a baptism was valid even if it had been carried out without the knowledge of the parents or against their will.

Outrage swept the Jews of Europe and America. Many Christian individuals and groups were also incensed by the kidnapping. Edgardo's parents vainly attempted to get their child back. The Jews of the Kingdom of Savoy appealed to the British Board of Deputies for their assistance. They, in turn, asked Sir Moses Montefiore, the most prominent and influential Jewish personality of the time to intercede.

Youth's kidnapping an astonishing story

In his diaries, Montefiore describes his frustration at the refusal of the papal authorities to consider the case or to hear his prepared presentation. He was denied an audience with Pope Pius IX, but eventually met with the papal secretary, which produced no change in the Church's position. In 1860, after the annexation of Bologna to the Italian kingdom, the Mortara family, filled with new hope, undertook new, but unfruitful overtures for the return of their son.

In the same year, Father Pier Gaetano Feletti, the ex-inquisitor of the Holy Office in Bologna, was arrested and accused of Edgardo's kidnapping. After several months in jail, he was tried and acquitted by judges who asserted that there were insufficient legal grounds for criminal proceedings. The decision was greeted with indignation and dismay by the Jewish community which had regarded his arrest as "a triumphant vindication and sweet revenge."

Reaction to the case revealed a great deal about the battle between conservative and progressive forces in mid-19th century Europe. More importantly, it was among the factors that motivated Napoleon III to commit his troops to join the Kingdom of Sardinia in driving Austrian forces from northern Italy, and to approve the annexation to the kingdom of lands that encompassed much of the Papal States.

Thus, the Mortara case had far-reaching results. The author asserts that, "The story of an illiterate servant girl, a grocer, and a little Jewish child from Bologna altered the course of Italian and Church history." Indeed, the maid who baptized Edgardo — dirt poor, and unable to write her own name — made a greater contribution to Italian reunification than many of the Risorgimento heroes whose statues preside over Italian town piazzas today.

Edgardo, reared and indoctrinated as a Catholic from an early age and a favorite of the Pope, became a priest and gained a reputation as a saintly, pious and tireless worker on behalf of the Church. He died, in 1940, an 88-year-old monk, in a Belgian abbey where he had lived for many years. The author writes without comment, "A month later, German soldiers flooded into Belgium, soon to begin rounding up all those tainted with Jewish blood."

The Mortara case is dramatic and many-sided and the author, a professor of anthropology and history at Brown University approaches it with the skill and style of an accomplished novelist. He weaves together the historical, social, religious and cultural stands of the astonishing story with clarity and compelling scholarship.

These unhappy events of a century and a half ago, speak for themselves. They cry out that blind prejudice and religious zeal can lead to tragedy and disaster.

Rebbe embraced Jewish outreach

By RABBI ZALMAN A. GROSSBAUM

Guest Voices

The Talmud relates that Rav Chanina devoted all his time and talents to exploring the depth of Torah. He was certain that if the Torah would ever be forgotten, he could restore it through scholarship such as his.

He devoted himself to constant study to try to attain greater understanding of the Torah's depths. He was convinced that through pilpula, intensive Torah Diaglogue, Torah would not be forgotten. He was even prepared to risk alienating the common folk to achieve his aim.

His colleague Rav Chiyah was of a different mind. He was prepared to engage in the most mundane and elementary tasks to ensure Torah would never be forgotten. He elected to teach six children corresponding tractates of the Mishnah. In due time, they would share their knowledge with others. In this way, he was confident that Torah would never be forgotten.

Rav Chiyah was of the opinion that we must reach out to the masses, even if this would hinder expounding upon the Torah's depth. He believed that by providing learning opportunities for everyone even beginners, we could safeguard the continuity of Torah. Given the opportunity, the people would become familiar with Torah, thereby removing the fear of its ever being forgotten.

Rav Chiyah personally devoted his time stressing the teaching of Chumash and Mishnah. He knew that with patience and perseverance, students would master the basics and share their knowledge with others.

Although each approach has merit, the Talmud concludes: "How great is the work of Rav Chiyah." It is fair to assume that Rav Chiyah was among the trailblazers of the "outreach movement."

But it is beneficial to explore the fundamental difference of opinion between these two Talmudic giants.

The Rebbe provides insight on this issue in his recently published Torah notes .In a lengthy dissertation on the concluding two mishnahs of the Mishnayot, the Rebbe offers a novel approach to the observance of mitzvot and its reward.

In the first of the mishnahs Rabbi Yeshuah ben Levi states: "Each and every tzaddik will inherit 310 worlds."

In the second mishnah, Rabbi Shimon ben Chalafta notes: "G-d found no vessel to contain brachah save for [the vessel of] shalom."

Both mishnahs attempt to explain the purpose of Divine service and offer a glimpse at the reward in store. They allude to different forms of compensation. This corresponds to the dual objectives in the performance of mitzvot.

Initially we are instructed to serve G-d so that we will merit a portion of 310 worlds (Gan Eden). The extent of this reward is related to the extent of our service.

Then we are told of the loftier objective inherent in all mitzvot, namely, to establish a link between finite man and infinite G-d. Through the performance of a mitzvah, a fusion occurs which unites the Creator with the created. A bond is formed which transcends logic and defies reason.

Hence, the first mishnah enunciates a reward for the righteous that is exclusive. The latter mishnah is inclusive. It underscores the ultimate brachah reserved for everyone who has forged a bond with G-d by observing even one random mitzvah!

This paradigm sheds light on the philosophical and practical endeavors of the Rebbe. From the first day of his leadership he tried to reach out to every single Jew. Rather than dedicate the resources of Chabad to those who held special promise and potential, he stressed the commonality inherent in all Jews.

He also placed his emissaries strategically wherever Jews are found, even if it meant hardship and self-sacrifice. He strived ceaselessly to facilitate a bond between every Jew and his Creator.

The Rebbe elected to ignite a flame of G-dliness among the masses by encouraging the translation of basic Torah works so that they became accessible to all. Large chanukiyot were publicly displayed to create awareness and to boost Jewish pride. The radio, billboards, satellite and fax machine were used to disseminate Torah and promote mitzvot.

After more than 40 years of leadership, the revolutionary efforts of the Rebbe recognizing the intrinsic value of each Jew have become universally accepted. They have become the conventional method of "outreach" among all kiruv organizations which have recently begun to proliferate.

Rabbi Grossbaum heads the Chabad Lubavitch Organization of Southern Ontario. These remarks were delivered in observation of the Rebbe's yahrzeit on the third day of Tammuz.

Swiss accounts on net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Aba Aisenstadt, Wladimir Soloweitschik, Eva Zollino. These are just three of the names appearing on the list of dormant bank accounts released this summer by the Swiss Bankers Association [http://www.dormantaccounts.ch/list.htm]. The conflict over the restitution of the assets of Holocaust victims has received a great deal of coverage in the press. But much more background, commentary and debate can be found on the Internet.

After much anticipation, The Swiss Bank Dormant Accounts Web Site opened [http://www.dormantaccounts.ch/]. In addition to the list of names, it includes a question and answer section about the claim process, recent press releases and a copy of the detailed claim form.

The Swiss-American Chamber of Commerce has prepared a chronology of events and a summary of the various task forces examining those events [http://www.amcham.ch/swissaccounts.html].

There are a few people who have spearheaded the fight for restitution. One of the most prominent has been Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress, which has several policy articles, listed at [http://www.virtual.co.il/orgs/orgs/wjc/dis10.htm]. Another key figure has been Senator Alfonse D'Amato [http://www.senate.gov/~damato/swiss.htm].

The claims process is being administered by Paul Volcker, former chair of the U.S. Federal Reserve System. His role is to institute an independent claims resolution panel. For a Jerusalem Post profile of Volcker and his work, see [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/21.Jul.1997/Features/Article-0.html].

In May, Stuart E. Eizenstat, the leading Clinton administration official on restitution, released his report on the situation [http://www.ushmm.org/assets/foreword.htm]. Far from a dusty report, this is a passionate indictment of how these funds lay dormant for decades and what must be done to right these historical wrongs. Also see Eizenstat's April speech to Agudath Israel of America [http://www.ita.doc.gov/media/gold.htm].

In July, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre [http://www.wiesenthal.com/swiss/index.htm] held a two-day conference in Geneva, entitled Property and Restitution: A Moral Responsibility of History" [http://www.audionet.com/events/swc/property/]. All the sessions were recorded and can be played back using RealPlayer [http://www.realaudio.com/products/player/playerdl.html]. And for more related stories, go to the end of [http://www.cnn.com/WORLD/9707/23/swiss.banks/index.html] and to Yahoo [http://www.yahoo.com/News_and_Media/Current_Events/Swiss_Banks_Reveal_Dormant_War_Accounts/].

Next week, we'll look at international press reaction to this story and at the effect of this controversy on potential heirs.

Montreal hospital to close operating room

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The reported shutdown of one of the Jewish General's Hospital's (JGH) 10 operating rooms this fall will have a "particular impact" on the Jewish community, says the hospital's chief anesthetist.

"There's a particular impact because the Jewish community is aging," Dr. Simcha Kleiman said in an interview with The CJN.

Kleiman, who has headed his department for four years, said cuts in provincial government funding to Quebec hospitals – including $13 million last year at the JGH – and a shortage of anesthetists have made it increasingly difficult to provide a suitable level of access to health care in the province. However, he stressed that he was confident the "very high level" of individual care at the JGH will not suffer from the closing of the operating rooms.

The JGH, between last fall and the coming fall, will suffer a net loss of two anesthetists, part of a general shortage of anesthetists in the province, which was also a major factor in the closure (a similar closure will take place at the Montreal General Hospital).

As a result, Kleiman said, lengthy waiting lists for surgical procedures such as cataracts or hip replacement – now already as long as two years – will be lengthened by 10 percent, although the triage system for evaluating the relative priority for surgery will ensure that acute or emergency cases will not be delayed.

Kleiman attributed the shortage of anesthetists to several factors, including that not enough are being trained to counteract the attrition rate and that government fee scales are failing to attract new anesthetists to the province while encouraging locally trained specialists to practise in rural areas.

Moreover, Kleiman said the Quebec Association of Anesthetists "miscalculated" and "underestimated" the shortage of specialists in Montreal.

The association has said the problem should be rectified by the year 2001, when 100 new anesthetists will graduate.

But Kleiman said he would "not want to be the patient" whose access to health care is delayed for the next four years.

Newly trained anesthetists practising in Quebec, Kleiman said, earn during their first few years of practice only about 70 percent of the norm elsewhere.

Moreover, he added, complex provincial regulations make it virtually impossible to bring into hospitals or university research centres anesthetists who are trained outside of Canada.

"The government could make it easier," he said. "We need more training positions at universities and the government has to be willing to recognize that there is a shortage.

"It has to create a situation that makes it more attractive to start a career here."

Kleiman said the JGH, due to its special status as both a public and a Jewish community institution, is "uniquely underfunded" by the province for the "level and quality of care" it provides.

"As a Jewish institution, we see ourselves as one of the jewels in the crown of the Jewish community."

Besides seeking to maintain its high level of care, the JGH is kosher and serves a special role in making members of the Jewish community feel comfortable there, Kleiman said.

Kleiman, for his part, feels a special loyalty to the hospital and has no plans to leave. But he feels there is a role the Jewish community can play in helping the JGH cope with the latest "challenge."

"As a member of the hospital community, we are happy with the kind of support we have received from the Jewish community. We have built an exceptional department" because of it, he said.

Through the hospital, he said, the community can help by bolstering efforts to recruit leading academics, researchers, teachers and practitioners for universities and the JGH.

Israeli teen dies at BB camp in Quebec

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Campers and officials of Camp B'nai Brith (CBB) in Lantier, Que., were devastated following the sudden death at the camp Aug. 3 of a visiting Israeli teenage boy.

Daniel Avraham, 13, was at the camp with a sibling and a group of other Israeli children, when he suddenly collapsed while entering the camp "rec" hall.

He was pronounced dead after being transported to a hospital in Ste. Agathe.

According to CBB president Marvin Libman, after an investigation by the Quebec chief coroner's office it was determined that Avraham died of natural causes, possibly the result of a congenital brain aneurism.

For that reason, he said, the coroner's office released Avraham's body for return to Israel on Aug. 5, although confirmation of death by natural causes would not be official until the coroner released a written report, which he said was expected late last week.

Israeli Consul General Daniel Gal, whose office was in contact with Avraham's family in Israel and helped in expediting the return home of his body, said the teenager was standing with a group of friends at the camp when he collapsed without warning.

Gal said that Avraham's father apparently died of the "same condition" while serving with the Israeli military 12 years ago in Lebanon. Libman called the sudden death a "devastating, terrible tragedy."

To deal with the trauma, the camp held a memorial service for Avraham.

Since Libman does not read Hebrew, he had "no comment" to make on published reports in the Israeli media on the death that quoted family members as suggesting that Avraham may have struck his head after a fall while playing.

He reiterated, however, that there was absolutely no doubt that the death was due to "100 percent, natural causes."

He said Gal had been in personal contact with Avraham's family in Israel to explain to them the finding here of the cause of the death.

CBB director Frank Weinstein, although declining to comment on the circumstances surrounding the death "for security reasons" until the Israeli children departed, was enraged by the Israeli press reports.

"The problem with what's been printed is that all those stories had no information. They're all made up," he said.

In a letter to a CJN reporter, CBB executive vice-president Penny Meshwork held off commenting on the death until all the facts were in, but called it, "a very sad and traumatic experience for everyone."

Young adult programs source of pride

MONTREAL — If Richard Diamond needed a boost of confidence about Canada's Jewish communities, then the recent meetings of the Keren Hayesod (KH) International Young Leadership Executive proved to be the perfect tonic.

Diamond, Canada's representative on the executive, said many of his counterparts from around the world were astonished by the success of Canada's young adult campaigns and some of the programs established by the country's Jewish federations.

He says representatives were particularly impressed by many of Canada's young adult programs, including Montreal's ProMontreal initiative, an effort to retain Jews in Montreal through social programming and a job placement service; Toronto's ATID program for future leaders and a similar program for young leaders in Vancouver.

The executive, composed of young Jewish community leaders from Canada, Europe, Australia, South Africa and Latin America meets once a year in Jerusalem and holds several teleconferences throughout the year. It was established three years ago to enable young leaders to share ideas and develop solutions to challenges unique to young adults.

Among the issues discussed at this year's meeting were efforts to reach unaffiliated Jews and ways in which to turn Israel's upcoming 50th birthday celebration into an effective fundraising tool.

For more information on Keren Hayesod or any young adult programs, call Glenn J. Nashen, director of the Young Adult Division of FEDERATION CJA, at 514-345-2637 or Eli Rubenstein, director of Young Leadership for United Israel Appeal of Canada, at 416-636-7655 (e-mail: eli@passport.ca).

Firm fires KKK 'grand dragon'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The firing of an ADT Security Services Canada salesperson last week for sending out a Ku Klux Klan (KKK) letter using the company's logo-imprinted postage metre capped a "week of hell," president Roy Maguire said in an interview with The CJN.

But although ADT was completely cleared of any wrongdoing, the incident also proved embarrassing for the company and raised sensitive questions over the rights of employees in a free society to associate with undesirable groups without fear of dismissal.

Maguire, both in an official statement issued Aug. 6 and in speaking with The CJN from Vancouver, was quick to term former employee Bryan Taylor's affiliation with the KKK and use of the company metre as "reprehensible."

"It was not in keeping with the philosophy of the company or my personal philosophy as an individual," he said.

But ADT also found its hands legally tied after it was discovered six months ago that Taylor used an office photocopier to reproduce a KKK poster, which referred to "White Pride."

At the time, the company issued Taylor a strong letter of reprimand over the content of the poster. He was an employee of 10 years good-standing whose KKK sympathies or ties were not known to management until the photocopier incident. Nor were they known to his fellow workers until now.

ADT's actions at that time were limited to a reprimand, Maguire said, because both a lawyer hired by the firm and the hate crimes unit of the Vancouver police department advised ADT that Taylor would have had solid grounds for a wrongful dismissal suit had he been fired at that time.

"The material," said Maguire, "was not considered illegal.

"It's impossible to screen people [before they're hired] for their beliefs."

In that sense, Maguire seemed to acknowledge that Taylor's use of the company postage metre gave ADT a legitimate basis for letting him go.

According to Maguire, on Aug. 6, Taylor, having fielded a call from the media about the discovered letter, which included the phrase, "We'll be back with a vengeance," approached him to inform him that he had "mixed up business and personal mail," including its KKK content.

"I told him not to go far from his desk," Maguire said.

Within the hour, a reporter also called Maguire, and he immediately summoned Taylor, who was identified as the "Grand Dragon" of the KKK's B.C. chapter, to his office and suspended him without pay.

The next day he was fired.

The company's quick actions evoked praise from human rights groups and the Vancouver region of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

In an August 12 statement and in a personal letter to Maguire, CJC president Goldie Hershon and Pacific region community relations chair Zena Zimces commended ADT and said:

"No employer should tolerate the presence of someone who is part of such a notorious hate group, particularly a firm dealing with security."

In an Aug. 13 article in the Vancouver Province, Taylor, 45, is quoted as saying that he now intended to sever his KKK ties of four years and to "burn his robes." He also said ADT was "totally justified" in firing him.

Your family history in the

will be a treasured memento for years to come

This year, we at Jewish Immigrant Aid Services are celebrating our 75th year helping immigrants get a new start. As a special anniversary project, JIAS Toronto in co-operation with UJA Federation is honouring the immigrant roots of our community with a special 75th Anniversary Heritage Book.

Regardless of whether your family came here in the 1800's or a brief year ago, we all were, at one time or other, immigrants who sought a better life with the assistance of organizations such as JIAS. Every one of our stories is fascinating and every one deserves to be told.

Send or bring three or four family photos, along with some brief information (as per the sample page on the right) to the JIAS office. Our editors will do the rest. If you have difficulty deciding what to submit, a JIAS volunteer will gladly assist you.

Your family history will make a meaningful gift and a cherished memento for years to come.

IN HONOUR OF OUR GRANDPARENTS
sample page
Old pictures can be very interesting. Start as far back as you can. Give names, relationships to you, dates and places of birth, and/or death, (from left to right) the location, date of the photo and any other pertinent information.
Include their line of work, the year of their arrival in Canada, as well as the political or economic circumstances that brought them here.
Covering a few generations will help create a visual family tree. Remember, a picture is worth a thousand words.

A number of donors have contributed generously to the JIAS 75th Anniversary Heritage book in order for us to be able to publish a book that represents a true cross section of the Toronto Jewish community. Due to space limitations we can't guarantee that every story will be published, or the amount of space each story will receive. We can however assure you that all will be equally considered. Since we are operating on a limited budget, we would appreciate donations from those who are able to do so.

Syria ready for peace, says Israeli Arab MKs

By LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A delegation of Israeli Arabs returned from its week-long visit to Syria last Friday and said at Ben-Gurion Airport that Syria is ready for peace, but sees little chance of reaching it under the Netanyahu government.

The 42-member delegation faced strong criticism on its return for the radical pro-Palestinian and anti-Israel statements some members made in Syria.

Labor party MK Sallah Tarif stressed that in his meetings with President Hafez al-Assad and Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Sharaa it was clear that Syria wanted peace but they did not think they would be able to achieve that goal with Benjamin Netanyahu.

Abdel Wahab Darawshe, leader of Israel's Arab Democratic party, said that "the Syrians let us know they were very frustrated with Netanyahu's government, and are not hopeful that Netanyahu would be flexible enough to be a true negotiating partner."

MK Nawaf Masalha said Sharaa suggested he was interested in renewing talks, and that the Syrian leader told him that "it would be a miracle if Netanyahu were to sign a peace with Syria, but in the last century we have had a few miracles."

A government spokesperson responded that Netanyahu was "ready and willing to sit down and negotiate peace without any prior preconditions."

The delegation was also the first of Israeli representatives, Jewish or Arab, to hold high-level meetings with Syrian leaders.

Darawshe told reporters the criticism against him in Israel was unjustified. His call at a refugee camp for the full return of Palestinians to Jerusalem provoked angry condemnations from right- and left-wing Knesset members last week.

"It was a mission of goodwill with a message of peace and that's what we delivered," Darawshe said. "We were all very happy with the visit."

Police complaints have been filed against some delegates and there have also been called to lift some of their parliamentary immunity.

Tarif said he had been told by unofficial sources in Syria that three Israeli soldiers missing since the 1982 Sultan Yakub battle in Lebanon were buried in the Jewish cemetery in Damascus.

Yona Baumel, whose son Zacharia is one of those missing, said that the International Red Cross had disproved that information several years ago after examining the graves.

One grave turned out to contain the body of a fourth soldier, Zohar Lipshitz, who was killed in Lebanon. These remains were returned to Israel two years later and reburied in Holon.

Baumel said "the other bodies were those of Arabs. That means that my son is still considered missing."

Masalha said he also met with Syrian Maj.-Gen. Salah Abd Hai, who told him that as a PLO commander during the Lebanon war, he was involved in the capture of several Israeli servicemen still considered missing by Israel.

Masalha said Abd Hai told him some of the servicemen were buried in the Damascus Jewish cemetery. Abd Hai would not say if any of the others were alive or where they were, he said.

Murder case brings brief halt to rhetoric

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A murder case involving a Jerusalem taxi driver brought only a brief pause to the hostile Israeli-Palestinian rhetoric.

Israeli officials last week praised the cooperation of the Palestinian Authority that led to the swift capture of three Palestinians who admitted killing taxi driver Shmuel Ben Baruch.

But the officials stressed that the capture did not meet Israel's demand that the authority clamp down on terrorist infrastructures in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Israeli sources said that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu dispatched a close adviser, attorney Yitzhak Molcho, to the Gaza Strip to thank Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat for his quick response in apprehending the three Palestinians.

But Netanyahu spokesperson David Bar-Illan said the arrests were "not the same as destroying the infrastructure of the terrorist organizations."

Israel called for the Palestinian crackdown on terrorism after the July 30 twin suicide bombing in Jerusalem that killed 14 Israelis.

In an effort to pressure Arafat to take steps against Islamic militants, Israel imposed a full closure on the territories and withheld the transfer of millions of dollars from tax and customs revenues it owes the Palestinian Authority.

Netanyahu also announced that negotiations with the Palestinians would not resume until Arafat demonstrated that he was prepared to fight terrorism.

Palestinian officials countered that they were considering a boycott of all Israeli goods to retaliate against the sanctions.

Arafat said that the Palestinian Authority would not accept "dictates" from Israel and would not carry out mass arrests of Islamic militants.

During his latest shuttle mission to the region last week, U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross succeeded in convincing Israeli and Palestinian security officials, along with CIA officials, to resume meetings aimed at re-establishing security cooperation.

After a three-way meeting was held in the West Bank town of Ramallah, an Israeli official reportedly voiced the hope that his Palestinian counterparts would provide information on the explosives used in the July 30 attack.

In a related development, the head of Israel's Shin Bet domestic security service, Ami Ayalon, was reportedly in London to probe claims that the attack had been carried out by Arab militants based in Britain.

Arafat cited the arrest by his forces of the three Palestinians who confessed to murdering Ben Baruch, as proof that the Palestinian Authority was working with Israeli security forces.

A Palestinian military court sentenced the three Palestinians hours after the 45-year-old taxi driver's bloodied body was found in a well in the Jericho area.

The court sentenced two of the men, aged 19 and 20, to life in prison with hard labor for premeditated murder. The third, aged 17, received 15 years in prison for complicity in the crime.

The three said they had only intended to steal the car, but killed Ben Baruch when he tried to run away.

More than 84,000 people visit Shaare Zedek's clinics each year.

Israeli budget cuts approved

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Israeli cabinet has approved a 1998 budget of some $46 billion that includes more than $650 million in spending cuts.

The Treasury had argued that the cuts were necessary for the government to meet a deficit target rate of 2.4 percent of the gross domestic product.

Finance Ministry officials previously announced that lower than expected tax revenues had forced the government to look for other ways to meet the deficit target rate.

The government also endorsed an inflationary target rate for next year of seven to 10 percent – slightly higher than the rate preferred by Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel.

The budget decision provided only a broad outline for next year. Specific elements, including where the cuts will come from, have yet to be worked out.

The budget also includes plans to privatize state-run companies. In response, Israel's Histadrut trade federation authorized members to go on strike Sept. 2.

But a Histadrut official said contacts with the government could prevent a strike.

The budget proposal, put forward by Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman, was approved at a cabinet meeting Aug. 13 by a vote of 9-3.

Ministers Zevulun Hammer and Yitzhak Levy of the National Religious Party, and Eliyahu Yishai of Shas voted against the proposal.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai did not vote. He walked out of the meeting to protest the denial of his request for an increase of some $100 million to the military budget. He had sought the increase for new weapons and ammunition supplies.

Foreign Minister David Levy also left the meeting.

Earlier this year, the cabinet cut some $226 million from the current year's budget in order to meet a deficit target rate of 2.8 percent.

At its meeting, the cabinet also endorsed reforms proposed by the finance minister, including opening the fuel and electricity markets to competition.

Histadrut declares labor dispute

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Histadrut declared a labor dispute on Sunday and threatened a general strike to protest a cabinet plan approved last week for further privatization and capital market and foreign currency reforms.

The government was given a deadline of Sept. 2 to open talks on these issues or face a nationwide walkout.

Labor officials also accused the government of failing to legislate pension rights and of trying to undermine collective agreements.

The crisis between the Histadrut and the government deepened after an apparently tense meeting Sunday night between Finance Minister Ya'akov Ne'eman and Histadrut chair Amir Peretz.

Peretz accused Ne'eman of "breaking every rule in the game" and of trying to trample on workers' rights."

Ne'eman said before the meeting that he doesn't understand why a labor dispute was declared and that Histadrut's fears are groundless.

Ross achieves little in mediation effort

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Dennis Ross, the U.S. special envoy to the Middle East, left Israel last week after four days of intensive talks with Israeli and Palestinian leaders and officials. But he went back to Washington with few tangible results, leaving the Oslo peace process hanging by a thread at a moment when Israel's tense relationship with the Palestine Authority (PA) has reached a nadir.

The ostensible purpose of the trip, his third in eight months, was to coax the PA into re-establishing security co-operation with Israel as a way of addressing broader political issues. The PA broke off these relations in March, following Israel's decision to build a massive housing project in Har Choma in the eastern sector of Jerusalem, claimed by both sides but subject to final status negotiations which have yet to begin.

The security question, one of the pillars of the Oslo process, assumed a far greater urgency after Hamas suicide bombers killed 17 Israelis in two separate terrorist incidents, the first in March in Tel Aviv and the second three weeks ago in Jerusalem.

As a result of the second bombing, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who was elected with the promise of bringing Israel "peace with security," suspended bilateral talks with the PA, sealed off the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and withheld tax revenues owed to the Palestinians. Netanyahu declared that Israel would not return to the negotiating table, nor ease the punitive measures, until the PA arrested a list of terrorist ringleaders, disarmed Islamic militants and smashed the terrorist infrastructure in the Palestinian autonomous territories.

Against the backdrop of this daunting situation, Ross tried (but essentially failed) to convince PA president Yasser Arafat to meet Israel's demands. Neither did he, nor King Hussein of Jordan, manage to persuade Netanyahu to lift the siege or the harsh economic sanctions. On Aug. 18, however, Israel eased the restrictions.

In accordance with their tough new policy, the Palestinians continue to insist that security co-operation must be inextricably linked with political coordination. Israel, they say, should freeze the Har Choma project and stop expanding settlements in the territories. Israel's position is that political matters such as these cannot be discussed until there is full security co-operation.

Incapable of breaking this fundamental deadlock, Ross was able to point to only one modest, face-saving achievement: the formation of a tripartite panel, consisting of top Israeli, Palestinian and American intelligence officials, whose mandate is to review and monitor security co-operation between Israel and the Palestinians. On Aug. 17, they held their first meeting.

In Israel's view, this is a step in the right direction, but hardly a universal solution. Given the PA's reluctance to make mass arrests or to confront Islamic fundamentalists in the absence of Israeli political concessions, Israel still awaits drastic, concrete steps from Arafat, who has threatened to boycott Israeli goods.

The PA, though, is working together with the Shin Bet in an effort to establish the identity of the two Jerusalem bombers, who, Arafat claims, came from abroad.

With Ross having returned home, the focus is now on U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, who is expected to make her maiden voyage to the Middle East next month. Albright has neglected the region, and in the interval, the "core bargain" of Oslo — security for Israel and self-determination for the Palestinians — has broken down, according to the outgoing U.S. ambassador to Israel, Martin Indyk.

Albright believes that the current peace process is gravely imperiled by Palestinian terrorism, which destroys trust and violates the Oslo accords, and Israeli unilateral acts, which predetermine the outcome of negotiations. In a recent speech, she called for a fresh start, declaring that "the interim (1993) agreement needs to be married to an accelerated approach to permanent status."

It is a noble goal, but is it achievable in this climate of increasing mutual acrimony? Skeptics don't think so.

Conversion panel hoping to break deadlock

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A committee charged with finding a way to resolve a crisis over conversions in Israel will make another bid to break its deadlock.

The committee failed to come up with a recommended solution by last week's deadline.

But instead of disbanding, the committee members were planning to convene again this week to discuss whether to extend the deadline.

Both Orthodox and non-Orthodox committee members stressed in interviews that the negotiations are not dead.

"The fact that we are continuing to meet means there's hope," said Rabbi Nahum Rabinovitz.

One of the other Orthodox members, Rabbi Simcha Meron, tendered his resignation last week, according to the Israeli daily Ha'aretz.

Although Meron has not officially retracted his resignation, he does plan to attend this week's meeting, sources close to the committee said.

The committee, headed by Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman, was created by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to forge a path acceptable to the three major Jewish streams to avert the passage of controversial pending legislation.

That legislation would codify the Orthodox monopoly over conversions performed in Israel.

The committee, which includes one Conservative, one Reform and five Orthodox representatives, had been meeting daily since June 30 in an effort to submit its recommendations by the deadline.

It was expected that the governing coalition would act on the recommendations by Sept. 5.

Although discussions on the question of how to register non-Orthodox converts in Israel were reportedly going well in recent weeks, the negotiations began to break down last week, according to the sources.

Bobby Brown, the prime minister's adviser on Diaspora affairs, indicated that the committee's negotiations began to break down after the High Court of Justice ordered the appointment of a Reform woman to the Netanya religious council.

That decision prompted protests from Israel's Orthodox establishment.

Religious tensions were further exacerbated by an incident last week at the Western Wall during Tisha b'Av, when police forcibly removed a group of Conservative men and women who were praying together at the edge of the plaza.

Haredi men, who find such egalitarian prayer groups offensive, tried to drown out the prayers of the 200 Conservative worshippers before the police intervened.

Despite the religious tension in the country, some committee members remained hopeful that a recommended solution could still be developed for the government to consider.

"Within the committee there is a great deal of goodwill," said Rabbi Rabinovitz. "This is a very complex matter. The committee is trying to solve a problem that has been building up for many years."

Said Rabbi Reuven Hammer, the Conservative representative, "There's a general feeling in the committee of wanting to extend [the negotiations], but the exact details have yet to be worked out."

The agreement to establish the committee came after more than two months of talks between coalition representatives and Reform and Conservative leaders, including last-minute marathon talks that involved Netanyahu himself.

As part of the compromise, the coalition agreed to suspend legislative work on the bill codifying the Orthodox conversion monopoly, and the Reform and Conservative movements agreed to suspend litigation pending before Israel's High Court of Justice.

Israel-PA talk security

The PA maintains that the Machane Yehuda bombers came from abroad and that there was no security lapse by the PA that was not also an Israeli lapse.

Government sources said Arafat and Molho also discussed the sanctions Israel imposed on Palestinians after the bombing.

Arafat rejected Israeli allegations that his planned "national unity" talks with militant groups amount to "appeasement of terrorism.

The Sunday Telegraph report claimed Ayalon had flown to London to meet with MI5 and other security officials investigating the activities of Palestinian militants in London, an alleged international centre for Islamic extremists. It also said the two suicide bombers had entered Israel using British passports.

"It makes absolutely no difference whether they arrived with British or other foreign passports," said David Bar-Illan, Netanyahu's communications adviser.

He contended that the most essential points are that "the terrorists' information comes from here, the explosives were obtained here, and their physical support was provided here."

Describing the growth of pro-Hamas organizations in the United States as "scary," Bar-Illan contended that the bulk of Hamas's funding comes from the United States.

He said that Hamas has "strong connections" with various groups in different countries. Israel, he said, was seeking information from foreign governments about Hamas activities.

Security forces are still trying to determine the identity of the two suicide bombers who simultaneously detonated explosives in the Jerusalem market, killing 14 persons and themselves, and injuring more than 150.

Challah program aids cancer patients' treatment

By MARILYN SILVERSTEIN
The Jewish Exponent

NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J. — Walking down the halls of the Robert Wood Johnson University Hospital with Leon Kartzmer on a Friday morning means navigating a sea of hugs.

Every few steps, Kartzmer, a retired accountant from Newtown, Pa., sets down his shopping bags and first this nurse, then that aide floats into the orbit of his arms.

The 67-year-old Kartzmer then picks up his bags and resumes his walk to 2 Core, the medical oncology unit at the hospital.

Each bag is brimming with more than 15 loaves of kosher challah for the coming Shabbat. But in Kartzmer's hands, the challahs are more than just bread. They are braided loaves of blessing — gifts for the cancer patients of Dr. Michael Nissenblatt, a medical oncologist.

"It really brings a smile to their faces, which is what we hope for," Kartzmer says.

For the past three years, Nissenblatt has been the man at the heart of the Challah Fund project, handing out challahs to his cancer patients, Jew and non-Jew alike, as a sign of life and hope.

Kartzmer has brought his hands and heart to the project since February 1995, when he lost his wife, Leila, to colon cancer. She was Nissenblatt's patient.

"In the Bible, there's manna from heaven," Nissenblatt says as he joins Kartzmer on 2 Core this Friday morning. "Bread is the modern representation of that biblical event.

"When a person is sick, the giving of bread, to me, is a sign of my expectation of ongoing life," says the physician, co-director of medical oncology on 2 Core.

"If I'm actually giving sustenance to a person — literal sustenance — I'm also giving literal life," he explains. "It's such a basic concept. If you get bread, that must be a symbol, a sign — 'They must expect me to live.'"

Nissenblatt and Kartzmer enter a room on 2 Core to deliver challas to two patients with lymphoma — Joseph Levit of East Brunswick, N.J., and Sheldon Kaplan of Parlin, N.J.

Receiving the challah is a reminder of things Jewish, says Levit, a native of Buenos Aires who describes himself as "not a very observant Jew."

Nissenblatt tells Kaplan that he is responding very well to his first chemotherapy treatment. "We're going to give you some bread as a way of magnifying your response."

This is the first time Kaplan has received a challah in the hospital, Nissenblatt notes.

"Frankly," Nissenblatt says with a smile, "I hope it's your last at Robert Wood Johnson and the first of many you will have at home on Shabbat."

As he takes the challah into his hands, Kaplan says the gift fills him with warm feelings.

"It makes me feel that I'm not alone — that there are other people out there who really do care for me," says Kaplan, a Grade 4 teacher.

The inspiration for the Challah Fund came from one of Nissenblatt's patients, an Orthodox Jew named George Kossof, who created a matzah fund for Jews who could not afford Passover food.

"That just settled in my mind," the physician says. "Then, in 1994, I was making visits in the hospital and there was a Jewish woman who had multiple myeloma. She was very depressed. She wasn't sure whether to make a gallant effort to stay alive or just to acquiesce to the cancer."

That week, erev Shabbat, he decided to buy an extra challah and bring it to the patient, Nissenblatt says.

"She was completely stunned, and a big smile came to her face," he says. "The next day, she was sitting in her chair."

"That one experience made me realize there was some healing power to that gift that transmitted much more than bread," says Nissenblatt.

"It was the symbolism of giving sustenance. It wasn't physical; it was metaphysical."

The experience made him want to harness the healing power of challah for his other patients, he says. Soon, he was distributing 30 to 40 loaves each week. To date, Nissenblatt estimates, he has given the healing gift of challah about 4,000 times.

"It's a lot of challahs," he says delightedly. "This has brought me great solace. Fridays became my happiest days."

Each of his patients has an uphill battle, says Nissenblatt, as he and Kartzmer share some bagels and coffee in the physicians' lounge. The challahs offer them some fuel as they negotiate that journey.

"It's a way of taking their minds and thoughts off the immediacy of their illness," he says, "[a way] to adapt whatever intrinsic ability they have to their advantage.

"That's my job as an oncologist: to take whatever positive things a person has and turn it to his advantage."

For Kartzmer, the Challah Fund became a way to fill the emptiness after his wife died.

"I was focused 100 percent on Leila," he explains. "Now, I've extended that focus, and it's done me a world of good."

For the past two years, Kartzmer has been "the bread man" at Robert Wood Johnson.

Each Friday morning, at 6:30, Kartzmer leaves his home in Newtown for the long drive to the strictly kosher Berkeley Bakery in Highland Park, N.J., where he picks up his challahs.

"When I first started doing it, I would just go home and cry — for myself, for them, for everything," he says. "It's part of the grieving and the healing process, being able to give to somebody else."

In addition to helping him heal, the challah project has opened up a whole new world to him, Kartzmer adds. "I've been able to reach out, where I wasn't able to before," he says. "Now, it's part of my life. I wouldn't change it for anything."

Licorice plant root used to help fight cholesterol

TORONTO — Scientsts at the Technion in Israel have discovered that the root of the licorice plant (anise) contains an ingredient that prevents cholesterol build-up in the arteries. When taken in the form of tablets, this ingredient yields results and a slowing of cholesterol build-up in the arteries.

The Technion team, headed by Prof. Michael Aviram of the Technion's Faculty of Medicine and Rambam Hospital, succeeded in extracting from the licorice a chemical ingredient called glabridin, a type of polyphenol molecule that delays the oxidation of "bad cholesterol."

Technion team

A high level of cholesterol in the blood is the main risk factor in accelerating the development of arteriosclerosis. Most of the cholesterol in the blood is carried by the "bad cholesterol," which is made up of a component called LDL, which settles on the artery walls. Oxidized LDL is the main factor in accelerating cholesterol build-up in the arteries.

Ingredients which can delay oxidation may be able to prevent cholesterol build-up on artery walls.The licorice, whose mechanism slows oxidation, is connected with the active ingredient's ability to trap within it free radicals, which are the main factor in the cholesterol oxidation process.

In the course of this research, 20 Technion medical students took licorice extract tablets in daily doses of 100 milligrams. After two weeks, blood tests revealed that the "bad cholesterol" had become oxygen resistant, in comparison to its state at the beginning of the experiment.

Canada-Israel trade soars in wake of pact

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Almost eight months into the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement, reports released from the Israel Economic Mission here reflect increasing trade between the two countries.

Two-way trade between Israel and Canada grew by 38 percent during the first four months of 1997 over the same period last year. Canadian exports to Israel rose by over 50 percent and Israeli exports to Canada rose by 40 percent during the first six months of the agreement, the Economic Mission report said.

According to the report, these figures may be understating the trade growth as many Canada-bound Israeli exports are shipped via U.S.-based warehouses and distributors and not counted in the overall trading figures. This could represent a further 30 percent increase in the values listed above.

Active players in Israeli-Canada trading are still working to identify the ways in which free trade affects their business. Some are already taking advantage of the elimination of duties.

One of the immediate beneficiaries is Loblaws, Canada's largest food chain. Prior to Jan.1, 1997, Loblaws was facing duties of up to 50 percent. This placed Canadian companies at a disadvantage as American goods could enter Israel duty free. Currently 100 President's Choice products are being shipped duty free to the 18 Greenberg grocery stores in Israel. It is expected Israelis will have access to some 1,000 President's Choice products by 1998-99.

Free trade may have "politically" helped Canadian Highways International Corporation's (CHIC) bid on Cross-Israel Highway. Although CHIC was involved in the bid prior to the agreement, president John Beck said the agreement has helped "warm-up" the business relationship between Israel and Canada.

Where the agreement could help CHIC, is in shipping its unique electronic tolling system technology, a similar system to what is being used on Ontario's new Highway 407. "One of the benefits of any free trade agreement is to make people more aware of international opportunities," said Mitch Patten, vice-president of Communications and Public Affairs at CHIC.

Ashkenaz Approaches: Ashkenaz, for those who don't know, is "a week-long explosion of sound and motion, a kaleidoscopic carnival of music, dance, film, theatre, song and visual art." This year it runs at Harbourfront Aug. 25 to Sept. 1.

The first Ashkenaz festival two years ago attracted roughly 30,000 people over six days. This time, there's no telling how many people will turn up to celebrate a culture reborn. The fest brings to Toronto some of the best klezmer and Yiddish performers on the planet, including the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, Adrienne Cooper & Zalmen Mlotek, Davka, Theresa Tova and the indisputable zaydes of klezmer, the Epstein Brothers.

Most events are free, but tickets are required for some special performances. For information phone 416-973-3000.

The Ashkenaz Parade is scheduled for Aug. 31. To join this joyful procession of swirling color from Kensington Market to Harbourfront Centre, meet at 12 noon, Aug. 31, at Bellevue Square Park in Kensington Market.

Media Watch: Look to Lilith, the Jewish feminist magazine, to explain why Adam dumped his first helpmate in favor of the more familiar companion we know as Eve. "Lilith was Adam's first companion, predecessor to Eve," the 21-year-old mag recounts in its summer issue. "She was Adam's equal in every way, so goes the legend, until Adam declared that he should be the boss.

"Lilith replied that 'we're equal; we were created from the same dust' – and when Adam continued to declare himself her superior, Lilith fled from the Garden of Eden. Adam then asked for a more tractable woman and got Eve – born from his rib and younger than he."

The mag has just published Meet the Matriarchs, a compilation of articles about Lilith, Eve and other biblical women. It's available for $12 (US) from Lilith, 250 West 57 St., New York, N.Y., 10107. The mag is also offering free sample copies of the current issue. Phone, 212-757-0818. Subscriptions are $18 a year from the same number.

BY BILL GLADSTONE

TOLEDO: THE JERUSALEM OF SPAIN

It is an imperial city on a hill, flanked by valleys on three sides. It has a Jewish quarter, old synagogues, and many churches and mosques.

Welcome to Toledo, the Jerusalem of Spain.

Even the name suggests a certain Judaic character. Etymologists speculate that it may have derived from the Hebrew word toledoth, meaning descendants or history.

Nestled in a U-shaped bend of the Tajo River about 70 kilometres southwest of Madrid, Toledo is home to only one known Jewish family today. But in medieval times Jews made up roughly one-third of its estimated population of 40,000 inhabitants.

The centre of the Castillian region of the same name, Toledo bred many Jewish poets and Torah scholars of renown, including Yehudah Halevi, Meir Abulafia and Asher ben Yehiel. Samuel Halevi, an influential merchant, built Toledo's lofty Transito Synagogue. Joseph Caro, author of the Shulhan Arukh, was born here.

According to historian Juan G. Atienza, Toledo's medieval Jewish community was "the most important contingent of Jews in Spain."

In his Guide to Jewish Spain, Atienza discusses Toledo's former significance as a "second Jerusalem" and points out a bizarre and astonishing cartographic phenomenon involving "the similarities of the names of several Toledan towns with other Palestinian towns, whose distances to Jerusalem correspond to the distances of these towns to Toledo."

The Spanish town of Escalona corresponds to Ashkelon, Atienza says, and likewise Mequeda corresponds to Maggido, Yepes to Jaffa, Layos to Lachis, and Noves to Neve.

But one need not look at maps to see the lingering legacy of a community that was expelled more than 500 years ago, after peacefully coexisting for at least 1,000 years. (Jews first reached the vicinity of Toledo in the 4th or 5th century CE but likely first arrived in the Iberian peninsula from Babylon in the time of Nebuchadnézzar.)

This spectacular old city, dominated by the imposing Alcazar fortress and huge 13th-century cathedral, boasts not one but two former Jewish quarters, the smaller of which is located within the shadow of the cathedral.

The Little Jewish Quarter was a Jewish business area; an adjacent street is still known as Calle de la Sinagoga. Perhaps not surprisingly, the remains of a synagogue were discovered three years ago in the courtyard of Corral de Don Diego, a local commercial garage.

Toledo's main Jewish quarter, whose handsome stone buildings and narrow laneways slope down to the river, boasts two of the most spectacular synagogues in all of Spain.

Evidently, just as Jews converted and became Conversos in order to survive, there was also Converso architecture. Completed in 1357, the Transito Synagogue (Sinagoga del Transito) survived the Inquisition by becoming a Catholic hospital and later a church. The name of Toledo's second synagogue, Santa Maria La Blanca, evokes a similar tale.

A grand edifice that draws busloads of visitors, Transito still boasts two lengthy Hebrew inscriptions, wrapped around the high walls of its main sanctuary. The adjoining Museo Sefardi (Sephardic Museum) provides many displays and artifacts of Spain's long Jewish history. (The explanations are in Spanish only but the gift shop offers guidebooks and other materials in English.)

An architectural delight, the mosque-like Sinagoga de Santa Maria La Blanca is a big room with 32 columns featuring moorish-style horseshoe arches.

Bearing many original Moslem symbols, the building has been much transformed with Christian iconography. Its one Jewish symbol, a Star of David, is located high up on a central pillar at the back.

With a bit of luck, you'll encounter many other sites of Jewish interest in Toledo. Near the synagogues, in the basement of the antique shop along Calle de Los Reyes, is a catacomb-like passage that once led to a hidden mikvah or ritual bath. Beside the Transito is El Greco's home, now a museum, formerly the residence of Samuel Halevi.

No plaques mark the Plaza de Zocadover, Toledo's picturesque main square. Centuries ago on this placid spot, thousands of Jews and Christian heretics were burned at the stake in the auto-da-fes that were among the Inquisition's greatest horrors.

Bill Gladstone traveled to Spain as a guest of the Tourist Office of Spain with the assistance of Iberia Airlines.

Canada-Israel trade picks up after deal

few years but director Freddy Faust points out the firm's penetration into the Israeli market was accelerated once Free Trade negotiations started.

He said there has been a 10 to 16 percent drop in the costs they pay on textiles and a 22 percent saving on finished goods. Faust believes in the long run, new employees will be hired, and sales will increase because of the agreement. He sees an opportunity in importing Israeli textiles into his 50-person plant in Canada and then shipping finished goods under North American Free Trade to the United States.

Bernie Klein, chair of Aztech New Media Corp. which publishes and develops value-priced software must continue to study the agreement before all the benefits are understood. "(The agreement) has some benefit for Canadian firms, but not in the immediate," he said.

Even the Israel Economic Mission report uses caution when looking at recent trade figures. While business enquiries to the mission offices here and in Montreal have doubled in recent months, it is still to early to draw firm economic conclusions.

An internment camp in New Brunswick for enemy aliens.

Documentaries among Reel Ashkenaz films

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Yiddish cultural festival, Ashkenaz, is hosting a Jewish film festival called Reel Ashkenaz from Aug. 25 to Sept. 1.

The features, documentaries and shorts span the years 1926 to 1997 and are from Canada, France, Germany, Poland, the United States and the former Soviet Union.

The Canadian movies, which will be screened on Aug. 28 at about 8 p.m. at the Studio Theatre, are Nothing To Be Written by Wendy Oberlander and In Living Memory by Amy Gottlieb.

Nothing To Be Written, mixing historical documentary with personal narrative, traces Oberlander's search for her father's past.

An Austrian Jew who found refuge in England after being exiled from his homeland, Heinz Peter Oberlander was arrested by the British authorities after being branded an "enemy alien."

Britain did not distinguish between Austrian and German Jews and German prisoners of war. As a result, 2,000 Jewish refugees from Germany and Austria were dispatched to labor camps in Canada. Oberlander's father was in one of the camps.

In her engaging 57-minute film, Oberlander's quest to acquaint herself with his experiences as an enemy alien is balanced by his desire to suppress that episode.

Oberlander, a restless and dogged researcher, extracts the story and discovers telling kernels of truth: her father and his fellow deportees were initially housed with German and Italian prisoners of war; the camp commandant in New Brunswick was an anti-Semite; and Frederick Blair, the xenophobic director of Canada's immigration department, actually believed that Britain's policy with respect to the internees was part of a cunning plot to flood Canada with Jews.

Despite Blair's paranoia, the detained Jews were given refugee status in 1941, the year Heinz Peter Oberlander was allowed to pursue university studies in Montreal. Within two years, the rest of the detainees were released. And so, the circle was closed on a bizarre chapter of World War II.

In Living Memory is a daughter's ode to a beloved father, a kindred spirit who taught her to see the world visually and politically.

An old man sits in a park and speaks to a woman. He is a retired silkscreen artist and she is the filmmaker. As they chat, it becomes clear that he, her father, no longer recognizes her, having lost his memory.

Gottlieb accepts his infirmity, but regrets that their relationship has been transformed by it. This 14-minute documentary is never less than poignant.

The other films in Reel Ashkenaz:

• Benya Krik, a silent movie from the Soviet Union about Jewish gangsters in Odessa.The script was written by the novelist Isaac Babel.

• Overture To Glory, a 1940 American Yiddish film in which the irrepressible Moishe Oysher plays a Lithuanian cantor enticed into leaving his synagogue in Vilna to perform in Warsaw.

• I Want To Be A Boarder and Jolly Paupers, both from 1937, are Yiddish comedies from the United States and Poland. The first stars Leo Fuchs, the so-called Yiddish Fred Astaire. The second is enlivened by the comic talents of Shimon Dzigan and Yisroel Shumacher.

• Trembling Before G-D explores with sensitivity and humor the situation of Jewish gays and lesbians in the Orthodox world.

• Tomboychik looks at life, love and sexuality through the prism of an inter-generational conversation.

• Ivan And Abraham recounts the adventures of two boys, a Jew and a Catholic, who flee a Polish village in the 1930s.

Klezmer bands tuning up.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Harbourfront Centre becomes one of the best places to hear good klezmer and Yiddish-style music next week when dozens of internationally renowned musicians descend on Toronto to perform at the Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture, Aug. 25 to Sept. 1.

Two years after the festival premiered to much hoopla and international recognition, the second Ashkenaz promises to generate at least as much excitement and danceable music. While this is a full-fledged festival of the Yiddish arts, more than 100 of the 150 artists involved are musicians and at least 60 of the 90 scheduled performances are musical.

David Buchbinder, artistic director of the festival, and leader of the popular Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, waxes enthusiastic about the roster of musical talent set to perform. Most concerts are free.

Hailing from New York, the Klezmatics "have been on the scene about 10 or 12 years," he said. "Their music is very strong, very original, and deeply rooted in the Yiddish traditions, with all kinds of other styles mixed in."

Andy Statman, leader of the Andy Statman Quartet, "is in some ways the musical heir to Dave Tarris, one of the great klezmer musicians of this century," Buchbinder said. "Andy is probably the single player in the Yiddish revival who most expresses the musical and spiritual depth of Yiddish music" as part of a jazz quartet.

Andy Statman

The festival also features the indisputable kings of old-style klezmer, the Epstein Brothers, who are enjoying a heightened popular demand as a result of the recent popular film A Tickle in the Heart. "Other klezmer groups are better known, but they've certainly got the biggest buzz right now because of that film."

Festival organizers have assembled a special group, the Fidl Kapelye, styled as a 19th-century Yiddish string orchestra, combining professional players of Yiddish music and local young string musicians. According to Buchbinder, "It's an unprecedented opportunity to hear the music played in the pure traditional style on stringed instruments only."

Reached by telephone in St. John, N.B., where the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band was performing in the Festival By The Sea, Buchbinder seemed equally enthused about the various other musical groups performing at Ashkenaz. The pity, he said, was that he couldn't name them all.

"There's so many interesting things going on. There's Esta, a powerful quartet from Israel that explores a more Mediterranean and Sephardic sound. There's Naftule's Dream from Boston, doing really interesting jazz fusion. There's John Zorn's Bar Kochba, performing his Masada Cycle compositions with a group of New York improvisers." Buchbinder's own Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band is also scheduled to perform its irresistible klezmer rhythms infused with contemporary sounds.

Detailed Ashkenaz programs are available in many stores along the Bathurst Street corridor, particularly around Eglinton Avenue and in Thornhill. They're also available at the Bloor JCC, the Bathurst Jewish Centre in North York, or from Harbourfront, 416-973-3000.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

My wife is a Alzheimer victim. She is fine some of the time, but I never know what kind of behavior I can expect. I love her very much, but I am 85 years old and sometimes find it too hard to take care of her. She does not let me out of her sight, so please don't suggest a day centre or home help. Is there anything else that I can do?

Exhausted

Dear Exhausted,

To provide care, you must be well and have some time off yourself. It may be difficult initially but the options you don't feel are viable may be the only alternatives. Consider all the possibilities. A housekeeper who comes in, at first, while you're at home, might become familiar enough to your wife so that you can have some time for yourself. Recruit family, friends and neighbors to give you a little respite. Tell the health professionals in your community that you need help.

Call your local Alzheimer organization. If there are none in your community, call the Canadian Alzheimer Society in Toronto at 416-925-3552.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Axworthy writes to Arafat:

Control violence, terrorism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy has sent a hand-delivered letter to Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority (PA), urging him to act more forcefully in combatting terrorism, The CJN has learned.

The letter was dispatched last week to Arafat's headquarters in the Gaza Strip, via Canada's embassy in Tel Aviv.

Its contents remain secret, but Rodney Moore, a spokesperson for the Department of Foreign Affairs, said Axworthy had called on Arafat "to do everything in his power to control violence and terrorism."

Axworthy also wrote to Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy, encouraging Israel to ease the closure of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Israel sealed off the territories, suspended peace talks and stopped the flow of tax revenues to the PA after a Hamas suicide bombing in Jerusalem on July 30 that killed 14 Israelis.

In his letters to Arafat and Levy, Axworthy reaffirmed Canada's commitment to the Oslo peace process as the best means of bringing tranquility and stability to the region.

Since July 30, Canada has been urging Israel and the Palestinians to return to the negotiating table and to resume security cooperation, Moore said.

By all accounts, Axworthy contacted Arafat after the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and the Canadian Friends of Peace Now urged him to do so.

On Aug. 6, a week after the bombing in Jerusalem, the CIC's national executive director, Robert Ritter, wrote a letter to Axworthy.

Ritter asked Axworthy to urge Arafat to "move in a deliberate and sustained fashion to progressively reduce and ultimately dismantle the terror network operating in areas under the Palestinian Authority's jurisdiction."

A day earlier, in a telephone conversation with a Foreign Affairs official, Simon Rosenblum, national co-president of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, suggested Canada should remind Arafat of his obligation under the Oslo accords to fight terrorism.

Moore said it is not customary to divulge the contents of letters

China won't help Iran build reactor

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TOKYO — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu began an intensive working visit to Japan on Monday after a stopover during which he was assured by China that it will not help Iran build a nuclear reactor.

China's deputy prime minister for foreign trade Li Lan Chin interrupted his holiday to confer with Netanyahu for more than an hour at Beijing Airport on Sunday. Their discussion included several key security issues, including Iran's attempts to buy ballistic missiles and materials for nuclear reactors from China.

"I insisted that it was dangerous for Iran to be armed with atomic weapons and, of course, ballistic missiles," Netanyahu said. "I asked that China exert its influence to block these deals."

He quoted Li as saying that China had decided against supplying Iran with the means to build a nuclear reactor.

"We welcome this as something that is very important and hope it will serve as a guiding light to other countries in their contacts with Iran," Netanyahu said.

Netanyahu attributed his interest in expanding trade with Far Eastern nations to his view that "the world is changing" and they are the world's fastest-growing markets. He suggested the possibility that China may emerge as the largest economy in the world and contended that it could develop a demand for Israeli products.

Stressing the incomparable value of Israel's technological prowess, Netanyahu said: "Israeli know-how is of infinitely greater value than Arab oil."

He added that Israel's effort to increase trade with the Far East "will not be achieved at the expense of existing commercial links with Western Europe and the United States, but as a supplement to them."

Netanyahu began his visit to Japan with a call on Crown Prince

The News in Brief

CANADA

Romanians' Plight

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has expressed its concern over the plight of the Romani (Gypsy) population from the Czech Republic and Slovakia, many of whom recently sought refugee status in Canada.

CJC international affairs committee chair Les Scheininger acknowledged the fact that many Romanis are fleeing the region because of racism in their homeland. There have been reports of individuals being attacked by skinheads.

Principal Appointed

KITCHENER — In a first for the area, the Kitchener-Waterloo Hebrew Day School and the Beth Jacob Talmud Torah have appointed a single individual to serve as principal of both schools. Heidi Gottlieb will be moving from Toronto to take up the position beginning in September.

The Kitchener-Waterloo Hebrew Day School is a full-day, privately funded Jewish day school that provides a secular education from JK through Grade 6; it has been in operation since 1991. The Beth Jacob Talmud Torah is a Jewish afternoon school which has been providing a basic Jewish education to children for over 50 years.

ISRAEL

Sanctions Eased

JERUSALEM — Israeli-Palestinian relations showed hints of a thaw last week after Israel partially relaxed some of its sanctions on the self-rule areas.

Israel announced that it would transfer 30 percent of the tax revenues it has withheld from the Palestinian Authority since July 30, when two suicide bombers killed 14 Israelis in Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market.

Rwandan Orphans

JERUSALEM – Thanks to the efforts of 50,000 Israeli schoolchildren, 1,500 Rwandan orphans will be equipped with school supplies when classes begin next month.

The supplies were purchased with funds raised by the schoolchildren, the Israel office of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the U.S.-based Jewish Coalition for Rwanda.

In addition, Project Back to School will pay high-school tuition fees for 250 Rwandan orphans during the next four years.

Immigration Down

JERUSALEM — Immigration to Israel, especially from the former Soviet Union, has dropped by 16 percent in the first half of 1997.

The decline was caused partly by increasing economic stability in parts of the former Soviet Union, Arik Hellman, a spokesperson for the Israeli Ministry of Immigrant Absorption, said last week.

Officials also said most of the Jews from the former Soviet Union who wanted to leave have already done so.

In the first six months of 1997, some 33,000 immigrants arrived in Israel, 16 percent fewer than in the same period last year.

The Jewish Agency estimated that an additional 50,000 immigrants would arrive by the end of 1997.

WORLD

Non-Orthodox Mikvah

CHICAGO — Illinois will soon get its first non-Orthodox mikvah, thanks to an anonymous donation by a Conservative Jew.

Unhappy with a family member's treatment at an Orthodox mikvah in Chicago, the donor pledged a major contribution for construction of a new mikvah to ensure that non-Orthodox Jews would no longer have to rely on Orthodox officials for ritual immersion purposes.

War Crimes Trials

VILNIUS — An accused Nazi war criminal who was stripped of his U.S. citizenship before returning to Lithuania may finally stand trial here later this year.

Legal proceedings against Aleksandras Lileikis, 90, were postponed last month after medical experts determined that he was not fit to stand trial. Under Lithuanian law, suspects cannot be brought to trial if medical experts rule that they are too ill.

Lileikis is accused of having handed Jews over to death squads in Vilnius during World War II when he was head of the Nazi-sponsored Lithuanian security police, known as the Saugumas, from 1941 to 1944.

German Reparations

WASHINGTON — A Jewish delegation negotiating Holocaust reparations in Bonn last week urged Germany to pay long overdue compensation to Eastern European survivors.

The head of the Jewish delegation said he had received assurances of support from German Chancellor Helmut Kohl.

Pro-Hess Demonstration

NEW YORK — Police arrested about 400 people in Germany and approximately 50 people in Denmark on the 10th anniversary of the death of Rudolf Hess.

Hess, Adolf Hitler's deputy, has become a cult figure among right-wing extremists since he hung himself in Berlin's Spandau prison.

Many of the arrests in Germany were made as right-wing extremists headed for rallies. German courts had banned pro-Hess demonstrations in much of the country.

Swiss Celebrate Zionism's 100th

BASEL, Switzerland — The Swiss are throwing a 100th birthday bash for Zionism, but the party atmosphere appears likely to be muted by anguish over the host's wartime history and the criticism it has recently received in the media.

Unusually heavy security surrounding the event is also likely to mar the festivities by underscoring the recent increase in the number of anti-Semitic incidents in the country.

The weeklong celebration will culminate Aug. 31 on the date and in the hall where Theodor Herzl concluded the first Zionist Congress 100 years ago, laying the foundation for the birth of the Jewish state.

Poor participation – at least from North America – and tepid interest from Israeli officials are foiling Swiss efforts to use the centennial as an international showcase of goodwill toward Jews.

The Swiss are still reeling from the international outcry over revelations that they profited from their wartime dealings with the Nazis and failed to return bank accounts and other Jewish assets to their rightful owners after the war.

Breakthrough seen in school funding

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The Ontario government has "philosophically accepted" funding for religious day schools. The issue now is where the money will come from, and how and when it will be distributed.

This was the summation given to The CJN following a meeting Aug. 19 between high government officials and a delegation from the Working Group on Educational Equality representing 40,000 of the 50,000 students attending faith schools, including 10,000 in Jewish day schools.

The delegation included Henry Koschitzky, chair, Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education (OJAEE) and Manuel Prutschi, executive director, Ontario Region, Canadian Jewish Congress.

At the meeting, the first held by the coalition with government, were John Weir, executive assistant to the minister of education, and Bruce Smith, MPP, parliamentary assistant to the minister.

"They agreed philosophically with the following three principles," said Prutschi:

• Parents in Ontario have a right to determine the way in which their children will be educated and the place at which that education will occur .

• Parents are entitled to public economic support in the choice they make for their children's education.

• Recipients of public economic support will cooperate with the minister of education regarding suitable achievement standards, to be met by all students in Ontario.

The key to the latest breakthrough is the legislation giving Queen's Park control over fundraising and fund disbursement in the education system, said Koschitzky.

Without the legislation giving Queen's Park control over education funding, agreement on help for day schools would be "light years away", he said.

The measure consolidating school boards becomes effective in January, 1998, and on funding in September, 1998.

Forming the Working Group on Educational Equality gave the government a body to consult on the issue, Prutschi said. "It was important for us to come together on our own."

'Gradual process'

In addition to the OJAEE, the group is comprised of the Ontario Federation of Independent Schools (OFIS), the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools (OICS) and the Ontario Multifaith Coalition for Equity in Education (OMCEE).

The delegation that met with Weir and Smith included Elaine Hopkins, OFIS president, M.D. Khalid, OMCEE, and John Vanasselt, OACS.

"I think the government is being very cautious," said Prutschi. "They are concerned that the capacity of the public to absorb all the changes it has introduced is saturated and that there has to be time for the public to catch its breath."

Last spring the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the Ontario government was not obliged to extend public funding to faith-based schools in addition to the Roman Catholic schools but it had the legal right to do so, if it wanted.

UJA FEDERATION

These days, Hanna Citrin needs a lot of emotional strength. She finds it at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency. Since her husband Gennadi is quite ill, Hanna tries to spend as much time as she can at the Centre to recharge her mental and physical energy. "We used to come here 4 or 5 times a week. Because Gennadi is in the hospital, I spend 8-10 hours a day with him. I still make time, though, to be at the Centre. Many people depend on me, and I too rely on them for emotional support in this difficult time," says Hanna.

A CLUB TO CALL THEIR OWN

Unique to the Bernard Betel Centre is the Russian Golden Age Club, to which the Citrins belong. The club, which offers lectures, wellness groups, community support programs and various other social services, has 423 members ages 65-95, and the number is on the rise. "It feels like a piece of life back home when we're all together," Hanna notes.

JUST LIKE HOME

Hanna and Gennadi Citrin emmigrated to Canada from Kiev in 1973. Searching for ways to meet new friends and interact with other Russian immigrants, the Citrins discovered the Centre and never looked back. "This is a wonderful way to meet people with similar backgrounds," explains Hanna.

'Overwhelming' evidence worked against Kalejs

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Nazi war criminal Konrads Kalejs may have finally found a safe haven for himself in Australia.

After three years as a visitor in Canada, and after earlier being removed from the United States, Kalejs, 84, was deported last week to Australia, where he is a citizen.

Backgrounder

While his presence there outraged the Jewish community, the Australian Federal Police believe the evidence against him is insufficient for a criminal conviction.

In Toronto, meanwhile, immigration adjudicator Anthony Iozzo ruled that by serving as commander of guards outside the Salaspils concentration camp, Kalejs was an accomplice to war crimes. Inside the camp, prisoners were worked to death, beaten, hanged and otherwise mistreated in the most brutal way.

For those who sat through months of hearings going back to May 1996, Iozzo's finding did not come as a surprise. The evidence against Kalejs was "overwhelming," greater than in most cases he has tried, said Justice Department lawyer Donald MacIntosh.

But sitting in the Edward Street hearing room last week, listening as Iozzo read his 60-page decision, it appeared for a great portion of the morning's proceedings that Kalejs had beaten the system and would be permitted to live out his years in Canada.

For 50 pages of his 60-page decision, Iozzo went to pains to describe why Kalejs did not participate in war crimes.

Many of those present – residents of the North York condominium in which Kalejs lived, representatives of Jewish organizations, MacIntosh – felt uneasy as Iozzo appeared to disregard the evidence that painted Kalejs as a war criminal.

For the first two hours of Iozzo's judgment, everything seemed to be going Kalejs' way.

Iozzo said there was evidence Kalejs joined Latvian nationalists after the German invasion of June 1941 to hunt down Communists, but no evidence Kalejs committed war crimes in that period.

Next, Iozzo turned to the heart of the Crown case that alleged Kalejs was a senior lieutenant in the Arajs Kommando (AK), a unit of nationalist volunteers that murdered tens of thousands of Jews.

Iozzo found Kalejs was a member of the unit from July 29, 1941 onwards but that there was no evidence he participated in the unit's worst crimes.

He made that finding despite Kalejs' own numerous denials of membership in the organization.

Iozzo also discounted Kalejs' denial he ever was at the Salaspils camp during the war, believing instead the eyewitness evidence of former Arajs Kommando men.

Despite catching Kalejs on two clear falsehoods that went to the heart of his defence, Iozzo showed little skepticism about the rest of Kalejs' testimony. The crown even showed that after he was ordered out of the United States, Kalejs assumed a false name, went into hiding and then employed a concoction of lies during his Toronto hearing to explain it away.

Nevertheless, Iozzo inexplicably never branded Kalejs a liar. He never mentioned the word "credibility" in connection with Kalejs, he never said Kalejs was lying to protect himself.

Instead, he seemed to bend over backwards to accept Kalejs' version of events and his descriptions of his own character, which fell just short of sainthood.

While he dissected [illegible] details of the testimony of other witnesses, most of whom served with Kalejs in the Arajs Kommando, he accepted much of Kalejs' version of events, particularly his description of the battles at two Russian villages in early 1942.

This went directly to the strength of one of the Crown's main allegations against Kalejs, that he participated in war crimes during battles on the Eastern front in the villages of Sanniki and Zabalotye.

Kalejs, a professional soldier before the war, said he had been called to duty by the Germans in early 1942 and given command of a ski unit before the attack on the village of Sanniki, which was a partisan stronghold. Testimony from AK men on the scene said after the German commander, Gen. Walter Stahlecker, was mortally wounded, Kalejs' unit went into the village, burned it down and massacred civilians. Kalejs, on the other hand, said there was a fight, houses were engulfed in the cross fire and his unit never massacred anyone.

Why Iozzo accepted Kalejs' version of events, after already determining he lied on the stand, is baffling. Two former AK comrade-in-arms said they had learned of the massacres from Kalejs' men shortly afterwards. In addition, the scorched earth/massive reprisal policy was precisely what was described by historian Konrad Kwiet as the modus operandi of Nazi units.

What had seemed like convincing evidence was turned to mush by Iozzo.

He rejected the stories told to the two AK men on the scene as "the braggadocio of soldiers." But what kind of soldier boasts about annihilating villagers? Clearly, only those for whom such conduct was routine.

MacIntosh said he was "astounded" that Iozzo did not find Kalejs committed war crimes on the Eastern front. He attributed it to his error in applying the wrong standard of proof to determine the truth of the allegations. Instead of basing his decision on "reasonable grounds," Iozzo "was at the high end of 'on the balance of probabilities,'" a much stricter standard, MacIntosh said.

Keith Landy of Canadian Jewish Congress and David Matas of B'nai Brith Canada, said it appeared to them the standard was closer to the one used in criminal trials.

Family 'forced' to send child to Catholic school

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OAKVILLE, Ont. — A Jewish woman is hoping that a last-minute decision from Ontario's education ministry will prevent her daughter from effectively being forced to attend a Catholic school.

Monique Charlebois has appealed to Education Minister John Snobelin, as well as to the ministry's Languages of Instruction Commission, to help her.

Charlebois' daughter, 7-year-old Simone Betito, will enter Grade 2 on Sept. 2. But since Charlebois and her husband want a French education for their children, Simone has had to attend a Catholic school because the local school board has no public French schools.

Charlebois says the case amounts to discrimination, and charges the Halton Board of Education with ignoring findings that there are enough children in the area to warrant French-language public school classes.

Simone is going to re-enter Ecole Ste-Marie, a French-language Catholic school in Oakville, where she is not exempt from instruction in Catholicism.

"In Grade 2, she'll begin studying for first communion," Charlebois told The CJN. "She already knows more about the life of Jesus than most of her classmates."

Simone also attends Sunday Hebrew classes at Shaarei Beth El in Oakville, a Reform temple where her mother is a board member.

Charlebois says the school board has offered to transport her daughter by taxi to a French public school in Etobicoke, 40 kilometres away. But that's "worrisome and disruptive. Besides, it's probably more expensive than setting up [French] classes right here."

Property assessment rolls late last year showed there were 740 French-speaking public school supporters in the region, Charlebois says.

Earlier this year, the Halton board's French Language Advisory Committee contacted some 1,700 families. Charlebois says 127 families representing 187 elementary school-aged children said they were interested in French public classes. The board received 40 registrations from those interested.

Charlebois says the board then offered a wing of a school for the classes, but only 17 parents expressed interest – too few, the board said, to warrant classes.

According to Charlebois, the reason the numbers dropped is that the board did not say where the classes would be held or who the teachers would be.

She says the board is being "terribly unfair" in relying on the lowest number and in rejecting the higher ones found by one of its own committees.

Dusty Papke, director of the Halton Board of Education, told The CJN that trustees "weren't comfortable" with just 17 respondents, "not enough to provide a viable program."

He said he could neither confirm nor deny the other figures Charlebois cites.

Charlebois believes there are enough interested students to fill French classes from kindergarten through Grade 4, but she's not interested in French immersion. "It's just not the same. There's no comparison."

She says there are other francophone Jewish children in Catholic schools, as well as Muslims and other non-Christians who want French language education.

Charlebois, a lawyer, has applied to the federal government's court challenges program for funding to take the board to court, based on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

She's also received a letter of support from her rabbi, Edward Goldfarb.

In the meantime, she's waiting for an 11th-hour ruling from the education ministry, which she says has the authority to overrule the board and set up classes.

The CJN's calls to the education ministry were not returned by press time.

Charlebois says her plight is ironic, given that 40 years ago in Quebec, her French-speaking husband was forced to attend English schools.

CORRECTION

The article about Petah Tikva Youth Organization (CJN, Aug. 21) stated that PTYO received a continuity grant from Canadian Jewish Congress for its recent Israel trip. In fact, the grant was given by the Action Committee for Jewish Continuity of UJA Federation. The CJN regrets the error.

COUSIN CLUB REUNION

Members of the Goldstein family, composed of eight siblings from Kirkland Lake, Ont. at the turn of the century, were recently reunited. Three cousins traced the family tree, reunited relatives and met at simchahs to introduce younger cousins to each other. A turnout of over 100 family members resulted. The second annual "cousin club" family reunion will take place next spring. Shown here are the organizing committee cousins, (from left), Hindy Lev, Brenda Lewis, Barbara Lev and Sheila Mostyn.

Arthur Rudolph case recalled

Despite requiring that high level of proof, Iozzo did go on to find that Kalejs commanded the external guards at Salaspils, even though he denied it. That point alone sealed Kalejs' fate.

But the question remains. Why did Iozzo bend over backwards to accept Kalejs' description of himself, his character and of wartime events?

The decision brought to mind the Arthur Rudolph case, in which the former Nazi rocket scientist also came to Canada after being deported from the United States. Rudolph too enjoyed the North American lifestyle and did not wish to relocate.

A member of the Nazi party from the early 1930s, Rudolph claimed not to know about the party's racist policies. While a vast amount of evidence was offered to show that slave laborers were dying all around him during the construction of V2 rockets, Rudolph claimed not to have seen any of it.

Incredibly, immigration adjudicator William Willoughby accepted almost everything Rudolph said.

He too bent over backwards to accept Rudolph's story even when it defied belief.

MacIntosh, who also headed the case against Rudolph, suggested "some adjudicators are influenced by the old man factor." They see a grey-haired senior before them and find it hard to believe they could have committed horrible crimes as young men.

Despite Kalejs' deportation, Matas believes Kalejs got "a three-year free ride in Canada. That's way too long.

"The result is that he goes back to Australia where he'll have a safe haven," illustrating the point that "we don't have a global system of justice, but a global system of immunity for the worst crimes," Matas added.

UJA FEDERATION KICKS OFF CAMPAIGN '98

UJA Federation's 1998 Campaign is officially underway. It was launched earlier this week at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, with the help of over 1,000 enthusiastic community members and Canadian singer/song writer Amy Sky.

Amy Sky

Young Israeli artists Hashavim also performed to the sold out crowd and Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut delivered the evening's keynote address.

More than 200 of UJA Federation's leading supporters attended a special dinner, sponsored by CIBC Wood Gundy and co-chaired by Elizabeth Wolfe and David Y. Green, prior to the launch.

Carol Kassel, who co-chaired the launch with Lawrence Bloomberg echoed the campaign theme of One People Forever when she said "UJA Federation has always been the place where the things we hold in common count for so much more than the things that keep us apart."

Lawrence Bloomberg praised Toronto's "flourishing and self-reliant Jewish community" but stressed "it is important that we not become complacent because the needs are ongoing and the challenges still daunting."

Last year's UJA Federation campaign raised $35.5 million to help hundreds of thousands in need. In addition to addressing local needs, UJA Federation continues to fund the rescue of Jews living in unstable parts of the world such as the former Soviet Union.

UJA Federation Campaign Chairman Leo Goldhar, who has visited numerous Jewish communities in the FSU since beginning his term, compared the work of the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency to that of the early chalutzim (pioneers) who built the State of Israel.

Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut

"I have had the privilege of seeing first hand the life-saving, humanitarian work that our dollars pay for," said Goldhar. "I see that we have helped create an insurance policy for Jews everywhere which must be supported and sustained no matter what our political or religious views."

During the last two years UJA Federation has introduced new initiatives including a satellite office in York Region, in order to expand community resources for more than 170,000 Jews in the Greater Toronto Area.

Royal Bank, CIBC Wood Gundy, Scotiabank, Scotia Capital Markets, Toronto Dominion Bank, Bank of Montreal Nesbitt Burns and Raptors Foundation were corporate partners in this year's launch.

Coin unspent

We had seen the photo that made the electronic and print rounds last week, and variations on its theme, countless times before. In full embrace, cheek to cheek and kissing, were Yasser Arafat, signatory to the Oslo accords, and a leading opponent of those very same accords.

Last Wednesday it was Abdel Aziz al-Rantisi, a leader of Hamas. On Thursday it was Nafez Azzam, a leader of Islamic Jihad. Both men, Rantisi and Azzam, are high profile, fanatic proponents of violence and murder against Israel and Jews. Arafat brought them together, along with other members of the rejectionist roster such as George Habash of the Popular Front and Nayef Hawatmeh of the Democratic Front, for a set of meetings in Gaza City and Ramallah to demonstrate the unity of the disparate Palestinian factions.

More sorrowfully now than angrily, we must observe again that Arafat is leading his people further and further away from their aspiration of self-rule and independence. He cannot achieve his ends through military means. He can only do so through political and diplomatic means. But to succeed, he must establish with the Israeli public a reasonable measure of belief that he is a reliable, if not trustworthy, partner.

But last week's highly-publicized "unity" kisses suggest more and more that such a belief would only be heresy.

"Resistance of every kind is the right way to confront [Israel]...We must leave the Oslo plan," Rantisi was reported as saying.

"We must cancel the Oslo agreements and return to intifadah," Azzam was reported as saying."

"We are one on our path to Jerusalem, the capital of the State of Palestine, whether anyone likes it or not...There was an uprising for seven years...We can erase it and do it again from the beginning. There is nothing far from us. All options are open to us," Arafat was reported as saying.

From Rantisi and Azzam one expects to hear the language of violent hatred. But from Arafat, whose signature is on the Oslo documents, one now expects, indeed demands, to hear the language of moderation and restraint.

Arafat's scorn and incitement to violence merely sow further doubt in the Israeli heart over the viability of any possibility of peace with him.

But far worse for the possibility of peace than the doubt he has sown in Israeli hearts is the hate that he continues to nurture in the hearts of Palestinians. By proclaiming to the Palestinian people that "all options are open," Arafat purposefully did not rule out the option of terror and murder. In fact he implicitly approved them to be appropriate tactics to achieving Palestinian political aims. Rather than setting a new example, an example demanded by the language of peace, a moral example, supporting secure, peaceful coexistence with Israelis and tolerance for peaceful disagreement, he exemplifies the old ways, the ways that are antithetical to peace, the ways of terror, violence and murder.

Even the Americans were dismayed. "It simply makes an already difficult situation more difficult," one senior official was reported as saying. Trying to avoid expressions of utter disbelief, U.S. State Department spokesperson James Rubin said: "We are going to judge...Arafat by deeds. Deeds are the coin of the realm when it comes to fighting terrorism."

Unfortunately, as the bitter past has proven when it comes to this realm – fighting terrorism – Arafat keeps his fist tightly clenched and the coin unspent.

Her parents were religious Jews

I appreciate the article (CJN, Aug. 14) describing the department established at Bar-Ilan University in memory of my parents, Frank and Vilma Martin (Szusz). However, I would like to clear up one error in the article, which referred to my parents as "strongly committed but not religious Jews."

From the time we first arrived in Canada in the late 1940s, my parents kept a kosher home and were members of an Orthodox synagogue. From their perspective, at the very least, my parents were religious Jews.

Onus on Ottawa to act on Arafat

Jewish community spokespersons from across the political spectrum have recently commented that there was a serious imbalance resulting when, at the United Nations, the Canadian government condemned Israel's Har Choma policy and remained largely silent on the failure of the Palestinian Authority to fulfil its Oslo security obligations.

Just as Israel's Har Choma construction is an obstacle to peace and contrary to the spirit of Oslo, so also Arafat's hesitancy to systematically confront Hamas and the Islamic Jihad is totally at odds with the Palestinian responsibilities under Oslo. Consequently Canadian Friends of Peace Now has asked the Canada-Israel Committee to organize a community-wide initiative requesting the Canadian government to publicly call upon Yasser Arafat to disarm and dismantle extremist Palestinian military organizations.

Balance on Middle East issues is a precious commodity and surely, if we expect it from ourselves we should require the same of our government.

Jews in the B.C. interior

Re: The article on the Jewish residents of Nelson, B.C. (CJN, Aug.14).

I have hitchhiked from Kelowna into central British Columbia, continuing up the Alaska highway into the Yukon Territory as far as Skagway, Alaska. In doing so, I encountered a Jewish presence in some of the most unusual places, including Fort St. John, Fort Nelson, Kamloops, Dawson Creek, Prince George and Whitehorse.

Apparently there are no synagogues or other religious institutions, but I met people by accident working in shopping malls, hospitals and government institutions who turned out to be Jewish or knew of others who were, and they supplied me with names and phone numbers. When I spoke to some of these people they were thrilled to hear from another co-religionist. Some of the people I encountered did not know that they were Jewish, though their grandparents or one of their parents were.

My opinion is that because of their loose affiliation they need outreach help to keep them within the Jewish fold. With that outreach, coupled with added services provided by the Canadian Jewish Congress, their religious and cultural identity would be enhanced.

Labor Zionist says Diaspora in danger

With all due respect to tradition and to the various religious views in Judaism – from chassidic and Orthodox to Reform, Reconstructionist and Egalitarian – without the spirit of the Enlightenment, which began in the late 18th century, Jewish existence in the Diaspora is facing extinction as a result of assimilation and intermarriage. Hopefully, that is not possible in the State of Israel, with its secular Jewish lifestyle, including a modern system of education, industry and army, features which also benefit the Diaspora.

The point I am making concerns the Labor Zionist movement, which I joined as a boy of bar mitzvah age when I joined Hashomer Hatzair. Later I joined the Poal Zion Youth-Hechalutz and still later, in the 1930s, I was a part of kibbutz life in Eretz Yisrael. For the past several decades, I have played a role in Canadian Jewish affairs through what is presently called the Labor Zionist Alliance.

What matters now is the fact that this movement, the Labor Zionist movement, has failed to attract today's Canadian Jewish youth. Now who will safeguard secular Jewish identity in Canada? If this Jewish movement fails, there will be no interest by parents in providing their children with a modern education in Yiddish and Hebrew. There will be no need for a Jewish Public Library, Yiddish theatre, nor for Yiddish literature or Jewish literature in English or Hebrew. Nor will there be a need for Jewish sports centres or even a Canadian Jewish Congress.

This problem should be discussed in the Jewish media, especially in The Canadian Jewish News. It is a problem that should be brought to the attention of Canadian Jewish youth. It is not only a problem for the elderly members of the Labor Zionist Alliance of today.

Hidden meanings in the Torah

Re: Barry Levy's biblical codes (CJN, Aug. 7, 14).

Maimonides explains in his Guide to the Perplexed: that every happening in the Bible cannot be taken literally, but was written so that children could comprehend it. However, when one reaches a stage when he is qualified to study the Torah in depth, including the Talmud and other pertinent writings, he is then qualified to delve into the hidden meaning of the Torah.

Truly, every letter and word in the Torah contains hidden esoteric meanings of future occurrences.

A.M. Klein was a giant in Canadian literature

By HARRY HEFT
Part 1

Enthusiasts of Jewish Canadian literature quietly observed the 25th anniversary of the death of A.M. Klein on Aug. 20.

For Klein's admirers, it may be difficult to determine the spirit in which we should recognize the anniversary of his passing. The circumstances of Klein's personal and artistic life are so spectacular, and at the same time so tragic, that one wonders whether the anniversary of his death should be seen as an opportunity to celebrate his many achievements or a time to lament his unfulfilled potential.

Klein was born in 1909 in Ratno, a small town in the Ukraine, and he was brought to Montreal by his family the following year (though he was later to claim that he had been born in Montreal). In Montreal, the now-famous Jewish ghetto that existed earlier in the century around St. Laurent Street defined Klein's cultural life, and it was this environment and landscape that he was to celebrate in much of his best poetry.

Klein chose to write most of his work in English and many of his central themes were derived from the Orthodox Jewish upbringing of his youth. Several critics have recognized him as the first writer to produce English-language writing that reflects an authentic sense of Jewish tradition. Klein's ability to integrate Jewish ideas into his mainstream work can now be considered largely responsible for the tradition of Jewish writing that took root in Canada in the decades following his death.

During his lifetime, Klein distinguished himself as a great Canadian poet and as one of the poets responsible for initiating the Modernist movement in Canadian writing. He was also a distinguished writer of fiction and literary criticism. The one novel he published during his lifetime, The Second Scroll, is among the most important works to have been written in celebration of the modern rebirth of the State of Israel, and his essays on James Joyce's classic novel Ulysses are considered among the pioneering works in the field of Joyce studies.

Klein was also an outspoken champion of Canadian and international Jewish causes; he wrote hundreds of articles in the Canadian Jewish Eagle against anti-Semitism and proved himself an effective, tireless fundraiser for the fledgling State of Israel. Among the other vocations Klein could have listed on his c.v. are lawyer, politician, professor of English literature at McGill University and speech-writer for Samuel Bronfman. Today, 25 years after his death, it is difficult to imagine a serious Canadian writer or a serious Jewish activist who has not in some way been influenced by and indebted to Klein.

Since his death, Klein, more than almost any other Canadian writer, has attracted widespread attention from both literary critics and more casual readers. No Canadian literature course would be complete without the inclusion of a healthy selection of Klein's works and an investigation of Klein's importance in the development of Canadian writing. Also, numerous volumes of his writings have been produced by the A.M. Klein Research and Publication Committee over the past two decades, including collections of Klein's complete poems, his short stories, his journalistic writings, his literary criticism and his more obscure notebooks. Numerous books and articles have appeared on Klein since his death and academic conferences and colloquia have been organized to discuss his writings.

A.M. Klein

While Klein was always recognized as an important writer in this country, it was only after his death that serious academic attention was paid to his work. It is ironic that this scholarly attention to Klein's work has benefited from strong public funding, while during his life, Klein himself never received the funding that he felt he needed to write the original works themselves. In the end, Klein became increasingly more disillusioned, feeling himself the victim of an uninterested public who had little use for poetry or poets.

When Klein died, he had completely disappeared from the public eye, the victim of an emotional collapse that had silenced him nearly two decades earlier. At the time that Klein fell silent around 1956, he was still in his mid-40s, and there is strong evidence to suggest that his best work might still have been ahead of him. Klein's prolonged period of silence, which followed an extremely public life, is among Canadian literature's greatest and most tragic enigmas. Over the past 25 years, the mystery of the lost contents of Klein's mind and imagination over this final period of his life has intrigued numerous poets, novelists, critics and biographers.

Among the strongest tributes to Klein's life and work that were written in recognition of his death was the poem For A.M. Klein by the celebrated Canadian poet Seymour Mayne. Mayne begins his poem with the line "So you finally made the N.Y. Times," capturing the bitter irony of the artist who yearns all his life for widespread (and particularly American) attention, only being able to obtain that attention by dying. In his poem, Mayne lists the many tragedies of Klein's life, including the fact that, unlike his namesake (the biblical Abraham), Klein never found a way to leave Canada permanently and "return to…Canaan flowing with the gilt honey." And, although Mayne addresses the madness that ultimately left Klein silent, "the gagged tongue/ limp and mute/ unable to call itself back," he also hints at the fact that the path Klein opened with his artistry and sacrifice made it possible for poets like Mayne and his contemporaries to find their own artistic voices.

Despite the excellence of the literary tributes that have been written to and for Klein by Mayne and others, one of the finest celebrations of Klein's achievements that I have experienced came from someone who had little literary experience and, as far as I know, had never published a word. Several years ago, when I was teaching Canadian literature at the University of Western Ontario, I arrived in class one afternoon to deliver a lecture on Klein's poetry. Before I began my lecture, a student I had never seen before approached me. She told me that she was not enrolled in the course and that she was not even an English student, but that, with my permission, she would like to listen to my lecture on Klein that day.

When I asked why, she explained that her friends were constantly discussing their readings of Klein's poetry, and that she felt left out. "I want to learn about Klein," she told me, "so that I can participate. So that I can finally understand what everyone is always talking about."

I was staggered. I knew that most countries had their celebrated unofficial national writers, but was it possible that Canadians would ever recognize one of our writers to that extent, or that Klein would emerge as that writer? Was it possible that Klein was becoming to a new generation of Canadians what Robert Burns is to Scotland or Cervantes is to Spain? I was suspicious, wondering if I were being set up as the victim of a cruel practical joke, but this student was sincere and she even participated enthusiastically in the class discussion, which was one of the most dynamic of the entire term. As the class ended and she left the room, I was suddenly left with an elevated sense of my role as a teacher, and of Klein's life achievements.

Given the extraordinary circumstances of Klein's career and the unfortunate circumstances of his demise, I am left wondering if it might not be more appropriate to celebrate his achievements than to focus on the lost potential. After all, there are much happier anniversaries on the horizon than that of his death. For instance, next year we will have the opportunity to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the publication of Klein's volumes of poetry, The Rocking Chair, which won him the Canadian Governor General's Award and which still survives as one of the finest books ever published in this country. And in 1999, we may celebrate the 50th anniversary of Klein's trip to Israel, which resulted in the publication of The Second Scroll in 1951 (the 50-year anniversary of which we can celebrate in 2001).

In the spirit of celebrating Klein's literary achievements, Part 2 of this essay will focus more closely on his poetry and fiction, in an effort to understand how Klein as a writer provided us with insights that no biographer could equal, insights into his creative self and his cultural environment.

Harold Heft recently returned from a visiting professorship at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and is the author of a new book On Your Mark, published by Macmillan.

The market after the blast

I passed the sweet smelling green grapes, the plump orange nectarines. Then the juicy purple plums and ready-to-be eaten red watermelons. Fresh flowers – red, yellow, white, blue. The fly-infested slithery grey and white fish with a pungent smell. Bright colors of nail polish for as low as NIS 2 (approximately 80 cents).

By Viva Press in Jerusalem

The vendors bellowed out their prices, while the bargain-hunting shoppers pushed their way through Tel Aviv's shuk Hacarmel.

The Tuesday crowd was impressive for a middle of the week afternoon. For most, there was nothing unusual about shopping at the shuk. And the lively atmosphere made it seem that everything was as it should be.

Three days later, on Friday, I went to another market. But this time there was an air of uncertainty.

The fruit and vegetables were the same. The bargains were probably better. The vendors still shouted out their prices. But the people were missing.

Approximately 30 percent of Friday's capacity crowd missed out on a great day of bargain-hunting. Thirty percent of the regular Shabbat crowd went elsewhere for their weekend shopping. Thirty percent of Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda shoppers weren't there and there was a feeling of sadness in Machane Yehuda.

Some seven shops were closed on Rehov Machane Yehuda, the main street in the market, where one of the July 30 bombs had exploded. Out of Rehov Tapusch's 15 storefronts, only three or four were open for business. The feeling in this part of the market was of a solemn nature.

In contrast, the pushing and shoving – key to Machane Yehuda – was taking place further on in the market. So, although 30 percent of the shoppers were missing, 70 percent were still there haggling for the best prices. There was still a lot of life in this market.

On this particular Friday, I was not just there to buy my weekend groceries. I had come for another reason. Armed with a microphone and a tape recorder, I set off to record the sounds of Machane Yehuda.

I had borrowed the equipment from Kol Yisrael (Israel's radio station), which explains the reason why I was followed, or rather chased, through the alleys of the market. Eager people wanting to express their views – about the market or things in general – ran after me and my yellow microphone.

Some of the more forward types came face to face with me and told me flat out whatever was on their mind. I explained repeatedly that I was not from Kol Yisrael and that I was doing a radio piece for Canada – it would have been too long an explanation had I said Halifax.

I had expected that these people would shy away after they knew I had nothing to do with Israeli radio. The opposite happened. The fact that this radio taping was for Canada made people even more eager to share their thoughts and feelings with people in the Diaspora.

The attack in Machane Yehuda left the Israeli psyche scarred; people here are hurt and angry. Some blame Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat for not stopping terrorists. Others blame Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for not wanting peace. The reality is twofold: the Oslo agreement was signed by an Israeli party and a Palestinian party and must be followed through. This means Netanyahu can stall the signings; however, he has no choice but to deal with the process – whether or not he opposes it. Israel is a country surrounded by those who think its mere existence is problematic. That is, even if a peace agreement is signed, it doesn't mean that everyone will abide by it or like it.

If Israel continues with the peace process, then there will be more attacks from Jewish and Arab exremists opposed to the plan. Similarly, if the process is stopped, there will be more Palestinian-initiated attacks by Palestinians who want their own state.

Some say this catch-22 situation can be overcome by physical borders. But how can Israel put up fences when a large number of Arabs reside in Israel? Also, if Israel does put up real borders, thereby closing off access into Israel, then the Palestinian government will have control over the port of Gaza. This would lead to difficulties resulting from weapon imports from other Arab states.

While these theories are on Israelis' minds, most of those to whom I spoke referred to the hard days they've experienced since the bombs. Business has suffered. People are more afraid to go out. One cab driver told me he only takes passengers who call ahead because he is afraid he may pick up the "wrong" person.

While the fear is understandable, it is no way to live. One of the hummus vendors told me people should continue coming to the shuk and not be afraid. He estimates the crowd will be up to its usual standard within the next few weeks. He said we have to continue living our daily lives after terrorist attacks, to show that Israelis and Jews will not succumb to their actions. He then turned to help a customer.

At the next booth fresh green cucumbers were selling for NIS 2 a kilogram. I bought five for 90 agorot (about 40 cents), and called it a day.

The wake up tour for students

This past summer in Israel, I had many experiences that have given me the clarity to see the true power of our Jewish heritage, the dynamism of students and the impact that activism can have. If only there was something that could unify these elements, I thought, the world would undoubtedly be changed. Then, as if G-d himself had reached out his arm, my friends and I all received a kind of slap on the head that resulted in our conceiving of an idea, a dream called the Wake Up Tour.

By Justin Korda in Jerusalem

The tour, an activity completely organized by students, will seek to uncover and expose the joy and vibrancy that is simultaneous with Judaism. Through the inspiring and uplifting music of Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach and that of some of the greatest rock musicians in the Jewish world, the tour's caravan will travel throughout North America waking up and rocking university campuses until a level of pure bliss is achieved.

At each concert venue, activism will begin when students unite to benefit their local community. This will be accomplished by having participants sign volunteer sheets or donate money for causes such as improving the quality of life of Jewish people living right around them.

On an international level, the Wake Up Tour will exercise maximum efforts toward freeing the missing Israeli soldiers. In this respect, the tour would be accompanied by a "Freedom Bus" organized by the parents of missing Israeli soldier, Zachary Baumel. This group will point students in the direction that would be most effective in the attempt to gather information on the whereabouts of the soldiers.

The student world, which is often plagued by boredom and apathy, will have to "wake up" to plan this tour. The students' careful planning and successful execution of this tour will revolutionize the hierarchy of priorities for the average student today.

That is the dream. Now the weight of reality must begin to balance the scale. Now the leap from the comfortable world of dreams and visions into the world of action and reality must be made.

As I sit here at a computer in a small CyberCafé in New York City writing this article, my heart is speedily pumping and my palms are sweating because of the events that are going to unfold in the next couple of days. The most popular Jewish Rock band in Israel, Facing East (also known as The Moshav Band) has been flown here to do a trial concert. Over the last two years, this band has found a following among hundreds of North American students who have spent time in Israel. The audience at this "trial concert" will be made up of Jewish students from university campuses throughout North America. If this audience is mesmerized and inspired by the band and the music in the same way that hundreds of other students have been, the Wake Up Tour will no longer exist as an awesome dream but becomes a reality waiting to happen.

To those whose memory serves them well, I ask if you can remember the joy you felt when you heard that Soviet, Ethiopian and Syrian Jewry were on airplanes heading to Israel. Now try to fathom the overwhelming excitement you will experience upon hearing that the missing Israeli soldiers were freed, or that the level of poverty in Jewish communities across North America has declined – and that you had a role in making it happen.

Try to imagine singing and dancing in a mosh pit type of arena, with a few hundred companions raising your spirits to a level so high that you feel as if you are flying through the air with a smile that can't be wiped off your face. Now wake up from this imaginary journey and make it happen, for the more people who assist in planning this event, the greater its success will be.

In looking at this idea and this event there is a lesson to be learned. The fine line between dreams and realities only exists if it is not broken. And even if this line is broken, causing dreams to soon become realities, it does not mean that realities cannot be dreamlike.

The Wagner controversy

Amongst my summer readings is a magazine published in Jerusalem. It is entitled Ariel, with a sub-title The Israel Review of Arts and Letters. Each issue brings fascinating aspects of Israel's intellectual and artistic life. Even the Jerusalem Post and the Jerusalem Report rarely delve deeply into the cultural aspect of Israeli life.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

An article by Lili Eylon, entitled The Wagner Controversy, caught my eye. The subject matter is clear; many Germans, like many (if not most) Israelis, and many Jews living outside of Israel cannot "digest" Wagner. His undisguised anti-Semitism and Hitler's use of his operas and writings, made the famed composer a bête noire for many.

Wagner considered Jewish music bereft of all expression, characterized by coldness and indifference, triviality and nonsense. To him, the Jew had no true passion to impel him to artistic creation, and a Jewish composer was, in his eyes, a confused heap of the forms and styles of all ages and masters. Like the Nazis after him, Wagner spoke of the "harmful influence of Jewry on the morality of the nation," contrasting it with the beneficent spirit of the German psyche. (Anti-Semitism is irrational, and Wagner himself proved it when he wrote also some complimentary comments on Jews.)

But time has a way of healing old wounds, and a couple of years ago, Wagner's opera The Flying Dutchman was broadcast on Israel radio during prime time and thereby broke an old taboo. The public debate that followed was passionate, one side claiming that music and its creator cannot be separated, the other side insisting that such separation was the only rational approach to music which, taken by itself, had a message all of its own, unrelated to the opinions of its composer. When, in 1981, the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra (under the baton of Zubin Mehta) offered a piece from Wagner's Tristan and Isolde, pandemonium broke out in the audience. A lot of people walked out, but the selection was played to its end.

Since then, surveys have been made in Israel about the issue, and those who want the German composer to be heard again cite other musical figures whose anti-Semitism was well-known, among them Frederic Chopin. Still, the opposition to Wagner is not unique – Richard Strauss, also a declared Nazi, running him a close second.

The prevailing opinion is that Wagner, and to a lesser degree Strauss, cannot find public acceptance as long as Holocaust survivors are still alive. Eylon puts it cogently:

"The entire argument about playing Wagner in Israel does not, in reality, centre around the quality of his music…nor is the argument about how deep-seated was his anti-Semitism really relevant. While it cannot be maintained that Wagner was directly responsible for German national socialism, there is no doubt that he was a powerful symbol in the Nazi era, and his music held a singular importance in the Nazi psyche. Thus for Jewish survivors of the Nazi horrors, Wagner's music represents a vivid reminder of that regime."

Speaking for myself, I have difficulty listening to Wagner, and I don't apologize for it.

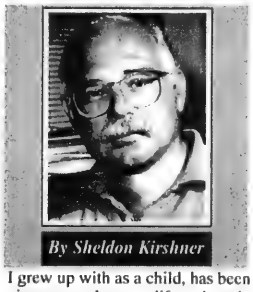
Yiddish gets a new lease on life

Yiddish, the vernacular language of European Jewry, is in decline, to state the obvious. But of late, Yiddish, which



By Sheldon Kirshner

I grew up with as a child, has been given a new lease on life, at least in Canada and the United States.

Old, flickering Yiddish films are screened at Jewish film festivals. A Tickle in the Heart, a delightful documentary about aging klezmer musicians, the irrepressible Epstein brothers, enjoyed a remarkably long run at Cineplex Odeon theatres. The Ashkenaz festival in Toronto, a joyous celebration of Yiddish in all its cultural manifestations, shows no signs of flagging.

Yiddish language and literature are now being taught at some of the finest North American universities and are an accepted part of the curriculum, as Ruth Wisse, a professor of Yiddish at Harvard University, has observed.

The translated novels of Nobel laureate Isaac Bashevis Singer, which extol the vanished world of the Yiddish-speaking shtetl, remain popular.

I'm not suggesting that Yiddish, which was dealt a near fatal blow by the Holocaust, has entered a new golden age. Nor am I saying that Yiddish, like Hebrew before it, will be revived as a national lingua franca. To be sure, Yiddish, beloved for its pungent, down-to-earth quality, is clearly in the doldrums.

As Wisse has written: "For all the talk of its revival, Yiddish actually has only a handful of trained scholars who are capable of translating, editing, teaching and interpreting its vast and varied accumulated heritage."

Nevertheless, the bells do not as yet toll for Yiddish. There are optimists who believe it is not, like the fabled dinosaur, doomed to extinction. Include Aaron Lansky, a McGill University graduate, in their ranks.

Lansky is president of the National Yiddish Book Centre in Amherst, Mass., an institution he founded in 1980. A year earlier, when he was a graduate student in Yiddish literature, he realized that something was amiss when he was unable to find the Yiddish books he required for his research.

As a result of his predicament, he established a central depository for Yiddish books. Someone had told him that only about 40,000 books were ever printed in Yiddish. But as he discovered, this was far from the truth. As he drove around the country in a rented van, amassing books from elderly enthusiasts, his collection multiplied. Within a decade, he had collected 900,000 volumes, all stored in a renovated paper factory near his home in New Bedford, Mass.

Today, the National Yiddish Book Centre houses 1.3 million books in its new facility in Amherst and in a warehouse in neighboring Holyoke. And they keep pouring in, at a rate of about 1,200 per week.

Lansky's Labor of Love

The centre, which regards itself as a clearinghouse for Yiddish literature, performs several functions. It preserves books which might otherwise have disappeared. It sells to libraries, universities and individuals. It offers fellowships in Yiddish culture to university students. It publishes a glossy quarterly, The Book Peddler, which carries articles about Yiddish language and literature.

And, in cooperation with National Public Radio and radio station KCRW in Santa Monica, Calif., it sponsored a 13-week series entitled Jewish Short Stories From Eastern Europe and Beyond.

Hosted by Leonard Nemoy, with original music composed by Hankus Netsky of the Klezmer Conservatory Band, the program featured 31 stories written by such immortals as Sholom Aleichem, I.B. Singer, Isaac Babel, I.L. Peretz and Philip Roth. They were read by 26 readers, from Walter Matthau and Alan Alda to Lauren Bacall and Claire Bloom.

Now the series is available on nine cassettes from the National Yiddish Book Center. (1-800-524-2727). Listening to these wonderful tales on tape, which range from the hilarious to the tragic, I was transfixed by the power of Yiddish and its body of literature.There may be hope for Yiddish after all.

A boy named Grisha

The fanatical Arab suicide bombers who snuffed out the lives of 14 Israelis in Jerusalem last month did not take an inventory of their victims' religion, ethnicity or political beliefs. Their sole objective was to kill and maim Israelis from all walks of life so as to destroy the faltering peace process they despise and fear.

Yet, in the numbing aftermath of the revolting bombings, the Orthodox rabbinate in Israel drew sharp and hurtful distinctions about the origins of one of the victims. By doing so, it forced many Jews, both in Israel and abroad, to hang their heads in shame.

I refer to the case of Grisha Pesahovic, a Jewish boy who was killed by the July 30 blast. A Russian immigrant who was merely 15, he had settled in Israel with his mother, whose marriage to a Jew (Grisha's father) had ended in divorce. Under the Law of Return, Grisha was Jewish. But halachically, he was not, since his mother was a Christian.

In this respect, Grisha was hardly unusual. According to the strict criteria of Jewish law, tens of thousands of Russian Jews who have arrived in Israel in the past decade are not considered to be Jews. But in all other respects, they consider themselves Jewish. They identify with Israel and its destiny.

Grisha also identified himself as a Jew. Had he not been mown down, he would have been inducted into the Israeli armed forces in three years' time. And, as a soldier, he would have put his life on the line for Israel. If Grisha had fallen in combat, he doubtless would have been given a hero's burial. But Grisha, a good student with a bright future, died under far different circumstances, and was thus dishonored in death.

As Grisha was not Jewish by the norms of halachah, the rabbinate decreed that his remains could not be interred in a Jewish cemetery. Grisha's distraught parents were relieved to find a Baha'i cemetery willing to accept him. But to their consternation, this arrangement collapsed in a welter of misunderstanding and acrimony.

Torn by grief, the family finally found a solution. Yuli Edelstein, the Russian-born minister of immigration whose mother and father are Jewish converts to Christianity, saw to it that Grisha was laid to rest in a Jewish cemetery, though in a separate section reserved for persons whose religious status is debatable.

Grisha and his parents should never have been subjected to this degrading treatment. Admitted to Israel as a Jew, Grisha should have been buried as a Jew without interference. This incident diminishes the moral authority of the rabbinate in my eyes and yet again illustrates the truism that Israel, on the cusp of its 50th anniversary of statehood, is a deeply fragmented society in dire need of reform.

Basel Congress

The Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora, situated on the sylvan campus of Tel Aviv University, has mounted a timely exhibition to coincide with the centenary of the first Zionist congress in Basel, Switzerland, which took place 100 years ago this week. It is called Blue and White in Color: Visual Images of Zionism, 1897-1947 and deals with the symbols and the motifs — posters, greeting cards, stamps — of Zionist culture during that period. In conjunction with the exhibition, which runs until October, the museum has published an intriguing and colorful booklet.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI HOWARD M. FINKELSTEIN

Mitzvah of tzedakah

Those of us who have been to the Kotel during the week have had the experience of being harassed by the many beggars seeking a few dollars. What is our initial reaction to them? Do we ignore them? Do we become judgmental? Are we inclined to feel guilty and therefore give them money or do we just move away quickly from them?

We have no problem supporting UJA drives, and we take pride in actions of the Israeli government in providing homes for thousands of Ethiopian Jews and absorbing hundreds of thousands of Russian Jews. But somehow, the individual mendicant bothers us, and we choose to either ignore him or reluctantly give him a few shekels or whatever.

How does Judaism approach the impoverished? Obviously, we are all familiar with the mitzvah of tzedakah. However, the philosophical underpinnings of tzedakah may not be that familiar. Perhaps an elucidation of those concepts will help us to gain a better perspective and approach to those of us who are in need.

The Halachah describes different types of poverty-stricken individuals, one is given special prominence in our parshah of Re'eh. He is the evyon, the one who is "ta'ev lechol davar," lacking in everything and desirous of everything. He is referred to no less than six times in our parshah.

At first glance, it appears from the biblical perspective, extreme poverty as symbolized by the evyon, or lack thereof, is dependent on the level of observance in the land of Israel. Rashi comments, "when you fulfil HaShem's will, others will have evyonim, but not you. However, when you do not fulfil His will, evyonim will exist among you."

Conversely, the Kli Yakar cites our sages who indicate that poverty comes in cycles, and appears to be an inevitable part of societal living confirming what the Torah says, "The evyon will not cease from the midst of your land."

In order to reconcile the opinion of Rashi with our sages, Rashi attributing poverty as Divinely ordained retribution, and our sages perceiving it to be part of life, one must apply the commentary of the Or Hachaim.

There is no doubt that a truly observant society could possibly see the eradication of poverty in its midst. However, the Or Hachaim relates that the poor are special in the eyes of HaShem, as they enable others to fulfil the mitzvah of tzedakah. One should not imagine that somebody would want to be that altruistic. But poverty is a reality.

Indeed, the mitzvah of tzedakah enables one to become spiritually enriched. Reducing one's charitable outlay leads to one's spiritual impoverishment.

We cannot "close our heart and pull away our hands." (Deuteronomy 15:7), but "we must open our hands to the impoverished and destitute of our land."

Especially, today, in the light of recent government cutbacks in social and supportive services for those of our community in need, our mandate as baalei tzedakah becomes more pronounced. Our sages have formulated the formula of 10 percent of our income for tzedakah. Few of us meet that goal, unfortunately. But we are told by the rabbi, "aser bishvil shftitasher," which loosely translates as, "Give a tenth in order to become wealthy." (Ta'anit 9A)

We all gain from the fulfilment of the mitzvah of tzedakah. Our approach to life is spiritually enhanced, and we ensure that our children will appreciate and evaluate our example as a people who are called by the Talmud, "Rachmanim b'nei rachmanim," compassionate, concerned and committed to helping those in need. May HaShem bless us in these endeavors.

Nostalgic essays entertain

It has been said that memory is the diary that we all carry about with us. In this anthology, 26 prominent Jewish Canadians have reached into their memory diaries to recollect and reminisce about days past: the formation of a rich, varied and vibrant culture in a new land; the cherished heritage of parents and grandparents; the barriers and hazards of anti-Semitism, including the multiple horrors of the Holocaust.

These brief, well written, affecting and informative essays pay homage to memory. They remind us that what is bitter to endure may be sweet to remember.

Bill Gold, an inveterate baseball player, writes about outstanding Jewish athletes of his time, among them Bobbie Rosenfeld, "undoubtedly the best Canadian woman athlete in the first half of the century. She played hockey, baseball, basketball and was also a runner at the 1928 Amsterdam Olympics, where she won a silver in the 100m dash and a gold in the 4 x 100m relay."

Early Jewish doctors and the health care of Jewish immigrants is absorbingly related by Dr. Fred Weinberg. In the early years of the century, when Dr. A.I. Willinsky looked for post graduate training in Toronto, he was forced to go elsewhere. Eventually, "he became the chief of urological surgery at the Western Hospital on Bathurst Street. Despite an international reputation and attracting patients to the Western from all over the world, he never did get a university teaching appointment in Toronto."

Ben Kayfetz remembers watching the astonishing movement of herds of cattle being driven down Claremont Street to the abattoir. He informs us also how the famous Londoner Shul got its unusual name. "It was the practise at the turn of the century for immigrant ships to stop at an English port such as Liverpool for quarantine purposes. The stay lasted about two weeks, just long enough for the Litvak immigrants to acquire a taste of tweed tailoring, a pipe and the other paraphernalia of civilized British living." They tried to bring this newly acquired sophistication to their Toronto synagogue.

The late Ben Dunkelman, son of the founder of the successful Tip Top Tailors, was a colorful personality — winner of the Distinguished Service Order for his heroism in World War II and a valuable volunteer in Israel's 1948 War of Independence. "When the war was over, Ben-Gurion offered me a supreme military honor: the peacetime job of commanding the entire Israeli armored corps, with the very real possibility of eventually becoming Chief of Staff." Dunkelman, however, turned it down and suggested that he could be of more service by providing food and housing for the stream of immigrants who had entered the country and would continue to arrive.

The book's most unexpected episode must be Joe Berman's encounter with an Indian chief named Ginsberg. The chief turned out to be a Montreal dealer in furs who had obtained a document from the RCMP exempting an Indian tribe from a ban on trapping beavers. As a result, "the tribe elected me Honorary Chief for all negotiations with the government, the police and with outsiders coming to do trade. So that is how I came to be Ginsberg — The Indian Chief."

In a brief review, it is impossible to do justice to all of the pieces that make up this oversized volume, enhanced by a cornucopia of photographs of loved ones and relatives.

Nostalgia can be a seductive liar, but this eminently readable and entertaining volume rings true. The royalties from the book will go to support Ashkenaz, a Festival of New Yiddish culture.

Look up your ancestors at the public library

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Rabbi Bernard Wladowsky was a man of diverse talents.

A rare Depression-era book, Canadian Jewry: Prominent Jews of Canada, provides details of his life, beginning with the information that he was born to Hirsh and Hesse Wladowsky in Smilo, near Kiev, in 1875.

"He revealed his ability as a singer at an early age, and sang in public when he was seven years old. At the age of 16 he organized the first choir in Kiev, and studied music in one of the government schools. Later he was cantor in synagogues in Kiev, Bachmut and in Sevastapol; was appointed Grand Cantor of Constantinople; and he then went to Bucharest for five years in the Coral Temple there.

"Then he migrated to New York and was cantor in the First Hungarian Synagogue in Harlem, and then in Chicago. Three years later he came to Canada, and for the past 19 years he occupied the position of Cantor in the University Avenue, the Men of England and the McCaul Street Synagogues.

"Rev. Wladowsky has gained a considerable reputation as a specialist in circumcision and has operated on about eighteen thousand children." The entry concludes by naming his wife and four children.

Written by Dr. Zvi Cohen and published in 1933, Canadian Jewry: Prominent Jews of Canada is an excellent but little-known biographical encyclopedia that contains about 800 detailed thumbnail biographies. Most entries feature a picture and information on place and year of birth, parentage, achievements, travel, spouse and children. In compiling the book, the author visited dozens of towns from coast to coast, including many where the Jewish populations have since dwindled or disappeared.

Familiar names

If your ancestors fled the pogroms of Eastern Europe between 1880 and the early 1920s, you might find them listed here – especially if they became accomplished, successful or philanthropic. Flipping through the pages, one sees familiar names like Breslin, Chernin, Dworkin, Dunkelman, Eisendrath, Grafstein, Korolnek, Kroll, Kugelmass and Willensky.

The Jew In Canada, Arthur D. Hart's hefty volume published in 1926, is another source of biographical details and photos of several hundred Jewish families from Glace Bay, N.S. to Victoria, B.C. Hart's empirical survey is a treasure trove of historical chronicle, descriptions of communal organizations, drawings of old synagogues, and other elements guaranteed to fascinate historians.

If your ancestors were here before World War I, they may be listed in Lawrence Tapper's Biographical Dictionary of Canadian Jewry, 1909-1914 (Avotaynu, 1993). Tapper indexed thousands of birth, bar mitzvah, marriage, death and social notices from the Jewish Times, an English-language fortnightly newspaper that was published in Montreal.

All of these books are available at the Jewish Public Library in Montreal, the Latner Jewish Public Library in Toronto and select other libraries. If you consult the card catalogues or librarians at such institutions, you'll find numerous other little-known reference works that could provide useful genealogical information.

For instance, the above-mentioned Rabbi Wladowsky kept meticulous records in Yiddish of every circumcision performed. Accessible through the Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region Jewish archives, the notebooks of the prolific mohel list names, addresses, fees paid and other information, and could potentially provide evidence of a birth in cases where no official birth record is available.

Swiss banking controversy

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we looked at some of the key figures in the fight to reclaim dormant Swiss bank accounts. Today, reaction from the international press.

According to the Jerusalem Post, the "publication of the list of dormant Swiss bank accounts has raised the hopes of many pensioners and opened old wounds." For a look at the effect of the release of the names on potential heirs, see Cents and Sensibility at [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/03.Aug.1997/Features/Article-0.html].

To see how the controversy is viewed in Switzerland, go to the Journal de Genève's forum on Switzerland and Jewish Funds [http://geneva-international.org/Forum/Dossier/Welcome.E.html]. You'll find links to articles on such topics as What Goes Through a Swiss Banker's Mind When Questioned About Jewish Funds? and Portugal, Too, Must Examine Its Past. You can add your own opinion to the debate at [http://geneva-international.org/Forum/Debat/Reactions.E.html].

I also recommend a fascinating exchange from the Washington Post. In Bankers, Not Collaborators, Walter Rockler argues that Switzerland cannot be blamed for collaboration with Nazi Germany. In addition, although Swiss bankers have behaved badly in returning the assets to victims' families, they acted "like bankers." Rockler was the Nuremberg war crimes trial prosecutor responsible for cases against German bankers [http://search.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/WPlate/1997-07/22/029l-072297-idx.html].

In response, Michael Hausfeld is much more critical of the bankers. "Knowing participation in the disposal and concealment of Jewish and other assets systematically looted or the profits of slave labor, both part of a systematic program of extermination, is not the business of banking. It is an offense against humanity" [http://search.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/WPlate/1997-08/05/019l-080597-idx.html].

For a look at how the Swiss are rethinking their role in the War, see Time magazine's A Painful History [http://pathfinder.com/time/magazine/1997/dom/970224/world.a_painful.html].

Finally, there is the story of Christophe Meili, a man of conscience. In January, the security guard at the Union Bank of Switzerland discovered bank employees were shredding what appeared to be important Holocaust-era documents. After Meili handed those documents over to Jewish leaders, he was fired, received death threats and eventually fled to the United States [http://pathfinder.com/AllPolitics/Latest/AP/1997Jul30/621.html].

Last month, President Bill Clinton signed legislation [http://thomas.loc.gov/cgi-bin/query/z?c105:S.768:] granting Meili and his family permanent residency in the United States.

Although Meili's future has been resolved, the story of the bank accounts is by no means over. Swiss banks must report by Sept. 15 on all foreign and domestic accounts that have been dormant since 1945. And a second list of names will be published on Oct. 20. For families hoping to hear about the fate of their property, the wait continues.

Every aspect of one's life should be Jewish, says rabbi

By REVA KAISER
Student Intern

TORONTO — According to the teachings of Kabbalah and Chassidut, there are 13 specific Jewish experiences which correspond to activities every Jew should partake in, says Rabbi Yitchak Ginsburg, an author, lecturer and Kabbalist.

Rabbi Ginsburgh, head of Yeshivat Od Yoseph Chai in Shechem, Kollel Menuchah Rochel in Hebron and Gal Einei Publishing house in Jerusalem, spoke recently at both the Bloor JCC and B'nai Torah Congregation.

"Jewish life is an array of different experiences, and each side of life should be Jewish. Nothing should be totally secular," he said.

The highest category, known as the "crown" (keter), is composed of the superconscious spirits, and has three dimensions. The first one, "faith," is the essence of the covenant between the Jewish soul and its Divine source. This is the ultimate Jewish experience. It is the realization that whatever happens in life is because of God.

The second experience (the second dimension of the crown), the rabbi said, is "pleasure" (ta'anug), expressed by the observance of Shabbat and holidays, which is the essence of pleasure, because everything one does on these days is an experience of Jewish pleasure.

The ultimate expression of pleasure in Jewish life is song and dance, which is the manifestation of the third experience, "will" (ratzon), the third dimension of the crown. Will is the motivation to do something; pleasure on its own is not a motivation for anything.

Next, are the three intellectual levels. "Wisdom" (chachmah) is related to the study of Torah, which is God's wisdom. "Understanding" (binah) is meditation, the act of incorporating into your soul the wisdom learned. The third intellectual level is "knowledge" (da'at), the way to directly connect to God. Every mitzvah is an expression of God connecting to us. It is our duty to take the mundane experiences of life and make them holy through deeds," said Rabbi Ginsburgh.

The next level is the primary emotions of the heart. "Kindness" (chesed), is the essence of Jewishness and is the act of doing good deeds. "Might" (gevurah) is introspection. It's more than prayer, it's cheshbon hanefesh, which is self-introversion. A God-fearing Jew does this to analyze his relationship with God. The essence of "beauty" (tif'eret) is the performance of the mitzvot. The 613 mitzvot are the body of the Torah and are the implementation of wisdom. "Jewish life is a full, beautiful array of 613 things to do," he said.

The next category is composed of the three powers of the soul that manifest themselves in action, and thus bring Jewish life more into reality.

"Eternity" (netzach) is exemplified through education, the continuity of Judaism. "Honesty" (hod) is seen specifically in business dealings. A Jew must realize that the first question he'll be asked in the world to come is: Did you conduct business honestly? The "foundation" (yisod) of Jewish life corresponds to the physical union and the relationship between husband and wife, known as shalom bayit. It is their duty to make their marriage holy, which is a uniquely Jewish experience, Rabbi Ginsburgh said.

The final experience, "kingdom" (malchut), is expressed through prayer, which is the ultimate experience of Judaism. This is the ability to express oneself through speech.

"If you put all the acts together," said Rabbi Ginsburgh, "[you] are living a full and complete life."

Corrections

The article on Agi Mandel, chair of this year's UJA Women's Campaign, (CJN, Aug. 14), stated that 500 new donors made three-year pledges. The 500 new donors refers to Women's Campaign only. Overall, 3,000 new donors made three-year pledges. The CJN regrets the error.

The article "Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla gets new rabbi" (CJN Aug. 21) stated incorrectly that Rabbi Yoseph Oziel received smichah five years ago. Although he completed Yeshiva Gedola's post-secondary rabbinical program in 1992, it wasn't until this year, following a further four years of specialized study — two in Talmud and two in Halachah — that Rabbi Oziel actually received smichah.

Harris helps create 'dedicated' team at Baycrest

Mitzi Harris

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After 25 years at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Mitzi Harris, employment services advisor, is still impressed with the centre's commitment to care.

"Everyone here is dedicated to helping the elderly and to serving them with dignity," she says.

Harris, who came to Baycrest as a part-time secretary in the audiology department, now works with the nursing staff. "I pre-screen before they are hired and set up meetings between union and management if there are labor problems. I also try to resolve any concerns the staff may have. They come to me if they are not satisfied after talking to the head nurse and to the union.

"I love working with the nurses. It's a tough job and, for the most part, they are caring and compassionate."

Harris says she can tell a lot about a prospective nurse "from a gut feeling. What I do is have an interviewee wait with a head nurse and observe how she interacts with the residents. She may come to us with a lot of experience, but what really counts is a certain attitude. If someone approaches her and she is open and receptive, then that means a lot to me. Our residents are here long term and they need someone with whom they can build a relationship — someone they can trust."

She misses working with the residents, however. "When I began working at Baycrest, I fitted clients and residents with hearing aids and batteries. I got to know a lot of them well and I miss their humor and outlook on life. There is a lot of wisdom in these halls. I still like to visit them in my day-to-day work."

Harris is proud, she says, to be associated with such a "well-kept, modern facility. The programs are good, the people care and the residents and clients are in good hands. We know we cannot please everyone all the time, but we sure try."

Toys serious stuff, firm finds

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

From left, Spin Master Toys' marketing manager Evan Propst tries out a Chatter Ring with company co-founders Anton Rabie and Ronnen Harary. [Ron Csillag photo]

TORONTO — Anton Rabie and Ronnen Harary are living the dream of many of us who, as kids, ached to own a toy store. But they go one better. These two serious young Jewish men own a toy company, churning out widgets and playthings that bring in serious dollars.

One may be forgiven for thinking that the company Rabie and Harary founded, Spin Master Toys, located in a non-descript building in the Dufferin/Lawrence area, is a beehive of fun. Instead, the 16 fulltime employees hunker down over desks and worktables, trying to fathom the nearly impossible: why kids like some toys and not others.

"Toys are the second riskiest business today, after software," explains Rabie, who at the tender age of 26, oversees the business end of the growing company. "There's no loyalty among kids. You're only as good as your last product."

Which means Spin Master Toys must be doing quite well. One of its latest products, after a string of successes, is the Chatter Ring, a simple enough thing that is maddeningly difficult to master, unless you're 8 or so.

The ring is the latest in a long line of toy fads that include the current Tamogotchi craze, but it's decidedly low-tech and much cheaper. The 10-inch wide steel hoop has five wedding band-sized rings hanging from it. The point is to use simple kinetic energy to get the smaller rings to simultaneously vibrate, or "chatter" on the larger one by turning it. The sound tends to annoy adults, so naturally, kids love them.

Originally a tribal toy in New Zealand, where it sold over 250,000 units last summer, the Chatter Ring is a hot seller here. Spin Master has manufactured and distributed some 40,000 of them across North America, and as far as Hawaii. Hundreds have been handed out free at charity fundraisers.

Rabie, a business graduate from the University of Western Ontario, and Harary, a political science grad also from Western, are both South African-born go-getters. They met at Camp Northland in the early '80s, and while still at university, parlayed a simple idea into a going concern: Campus Faces was a full color 28-by 40-inch poster of photographs of students, surrounded by 30 eye-catching advertisements. It was distributed free to six Ontario universities and grossed $100,000 in one year.

From there, the partners set up a kiosk at the corner of Yonge and St. Clair and launched the Earth Buddy, which resulted in just about every kid growing grass "hair" from a cute little nylon-stuffed head. In six months, the product generated sales of $1.75 million, and the boys never looked back.

They established Spin Master Toys in 1994 and in short order, marketed a string of hits, including Radical Reptiles (foam dinosaurs on a stiff leash), Spin-ab-lo (made even more popular by the Cirque de Soleil) and the still-popular Devil Sticks. Current strong sellers are Zip Flyer Kites, which require no wind, and Grow-Things Dinosaurs, inexpensive dino eggs that "hatch" and grow to 10 times their size when immersed in water. The company has purchased 1.3 million eggs from the Orient and has shipped nearly all of them to every major retailer in the U.S. and Canada

In all, the firm has 10 "active" items on its roster, with most requiring some dexterity.

And in case you're banking on becoming a rich toy inventor, keep in mind what the company has found: for every idea that's accepted, 100 are rejected.

"It's not as straightforward as it may seem," understates Harary, also 26, who works with inventors and engineers.

But the real test comes once a week, when randomly-selected kids come to the company after school and let everyone know which toys are cool and which aren't.

"Figuring out the feasibility of a toy," says Rabie, poring over computer print-outs, "is tremendously challenging."

Witz helps make public speaking fun

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Standing up and speaking in front of an audience makes most people's hearts race and their knees tremble.

Marion Witz, however, president of Witz and Associates and author of Stand Up and Talk to 1,000 People (McLeod Publishers), claims that not only can people learn to speak in public, they can really begin to enjoy it.

Witz, who is hired by companies to teach employees how to give presentations, also teaches privately and in groups. She claims that if people have a "step by step method to follow, public speaking becomes easy. My dream is for as many people as possible to learn how."

Panicking before giving a talk, says Witz, is normal. "Rather than focusing on what they want to do, speakers often focus on what they think they cannot do. They worry that they are not as good as the last speaker, that they will make a poor impression or that they'll forget to say the most important thing. These fears, however, can be conquered."

People who learn to conquer these fears do not go through a personality change, says Witz.

"They are just changing their abilities. Learning public speaking is a process like any other, such as learning to ride a bike or play golf. If you learn every step along the way, you will get your message across effectively."

Marion Witz

In her book, which took four months to write, Witz breaks down the public speaking process into five steps, including the desire factor, identifying the type of presentation, knowing the audience, preparing the script and delivering the presentation.

"One of the difficulties of preparing a presentation is knowing where to start. Until you know what it is you want to say, you will flounder around with ideas and become more nervous as you begin to feel lost...The desire factor becomes your starting point. When you ask yourself the questions, 'Why do I want to do this presentation and what do I want to achieve?' you have a beginning."

Witz considers the voice to be like an instrument. "The sound that comes out is dependent on the player and people can learn to play it well. I can teach most people to develop their voice in 10 hours of classes over five weeks. After these five weeks, students can develop a stronger, richer and more modulated voice. I stress, however, that I am an elocution teacher, not a speech pathologist. Some people do need a speech pathologist.

Classes must take place weekly, she says, because time is needed during the week for 20 minutes of daily breathing, relaxation and resonance exercises. Most of these can be done while in the car or while taking a shower.

Snidermans gather for reunion

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Four generations of one family fressed and frolicked at a recent family reunion, celebrating a century of Snidermans.

An estimated 200 people living in the United States and Canada can trace their origins to Huna and Leah Sniderman, a couple from a shtetl near Odessa, who married sometime in the 1860s.

Their surviving children, four sons born between 1869 and 1888, emigrated to Canada around 1915. Two sons, Israel and Jacob, settled in Toronto and were eventually joined by their parents. Their brothers, David and Louis put down roots in Detroit.

A group of the brothers' descendants gathered at a North York hotel for the recent reunion, arriving from as far as California, Texas, England and Japan. The festivities included singing, folk-dancing, recipe-swapping and plenty of schmoozing. A medical data bank was also set up.

The reunion, which drew 130 people, was organized by Torontonians David and Georgina Paikin, and their son Barney. David Paikin, the grandson of Israel, remembered visiting cousins in Detroit when he was a child, but the contact with the American branch of the family was limited in later years.

The impetus for organizing a big reunion came from Albert Sniderman of the American contingent of the family. In 1964 he took on the responsibility of becoming family genealogist by researching the family history and devising a numerical family tree. There were too many Snidermans with the same first name so he used code numbers to identify them, he said.

All the members of the Sniderman family were assigned a six-digit number which identified their place on the family tree.

In 1994 Albert suggested the family hold a reunion to bring the various members of the Sniderman family together. It took place in Detroit that year. David Paikin said it was such a success he offered to organize the 1997 reunion in Toronto.

With all the singing, dancing and merry-making going on, the second reunion appeared to equal the success of the first and that was confirmed by many of the guests. Barney Paikin said that he enjoyed getting reacquainted with his cousins. "It's great to see them and pick up from where we left off."

Sherry Rose Sniderman, who flew in from Texas, said it was always fun to meet other members of the family. "I find we have the same sense of humor. We really enjoy each other's company."

Former Torontonian Licia Crystal, currently a resident of London, England, came to Toronto with her two children especially for this event. "I want my children to meet their cousins and to know that their family is more than the nuclear family."

Oriole race pits trustee, former MP, and activist

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In his attempt to follow in his mother's footsteps at Queen's Park, David Caplan, a two-term school trustee, faces former member of Parliament Barbara Greene and community activist James Kafieh in the Sept. 4 by-election in Oriole riding.

Elinor Caplan held Oriole for the Liberals for 12 years before giving it up to run successfully in the riding of Thornhill in last June's federal election.

The upcoming race is expected to be a tight one. In 1995, Caplan won Oriole by fewer than 1,000 votes.

The riding is bounded by Steeles Avenue and Highway 401, and by Victoria Park Road and Leslie Street. Nearly half of the 36,000 eligible voters are tenants and there's a diverse ethnic mix, with large Farsi and Chinese communities. Affluent homes are just blocks away from socially assisted housing. It's estimated 10 percent of the population is Jewish.

David Caplan

Barbara Greene

Caplan, 32, points to several achievements in his six years as a full-time trustee on the North York Board of Education and as vice-chair of the Metro Toronto School Board, most notably, having introduced the first zero tax increase in over 20 years.

The coming byelection "will be hard-fought," he says, "but we're confident Oriole will stay Liberal."

He says he's encountering palpable hostility toward the Mike Harris Tories and people are expressing fear that health care and education are eroding.

Voters are also upset, he says, with the way the provincial government has handled the megacity debate and with changes to landlord-tenant laws he feels will "effectively scrap" rent controls.

With two seniors' residences in the riding, Caplan also hears apprehension when it comes to de-listing of drugs from the Ontario health plan, hospital closings and drug dispensing fees.

"People are angry and disheartened that the government isn't listening," Caplan says.

Greene, his Tory opponent, says voters are generally supportive of the government's cost cutting.

Armed with a reputation for hard work and a record of solid achievements, Greene, 51, says she is running partly because she misses public life.

Greene was the Conservative MP for Don Valley North from 1988 to 1993 and chair of the powerful standing committee on health welfare and social affairs, and the status of women.

Greene has also chaired the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group and was active in the struggle for Soviet Jewry.

In 1972, Greene was elected to North York council, where she stayed for 11 years as controller and later was appointed as deputy mayor.

Greene prefers the word restructuring to cuts and points out that some hospitals targeted for closure will become long-term, ambulatory or chronic care facilities.

Faced with $6 billion less in transfer payments from Ottawa over three years, the Harris Tories, she says, have actually increased spending in key sectors by $1 billion in the same period.

Oriole "can be a swing riding," says Greene. "It's a tight race. The Caplan name carries weight. But people are pleased that Premier Harris has kept his promises, especially when it comes to reducing the deficit."

James Kafieh

"Send a fighter to Queen's Park," admonishes campaign literature that shows Kafieh, the New Democratic Party hopeful, standing before a Canadian Armed Forces jet he piloted 16 years ago.

He agrees that health care and education are major concerns in the riding and has found that a lot of voters think Harris "has gone too far, too fast."

"A lot of people who voted for him won't do it again," says Kafieh, 38, adding that he's drawn support from both disenchanted Conservatives and Liberals.

Kafieh's a political newcomer, but he has chalked up a long list of grassroots involvement. During the height of the recession, he worked for JobsOntario and says the project created 800 new jobs.

As a former member of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council and one-time president of the Canadian Arab Federation, Kafieh says he is well-equipped to understand the plight of immigrants and minorities.

Kafieh favors an integrated system of community health care clinics and points to the Sheppard subway as a solid NDP accomplishment.

The Tories have "bulldozed through" legislation in several areas, while the Liberals are "a second Tory party. Only the NDP look after things ordinary people use every day, like transit, hospitals and schools," he says. "The vast majority of people benefit from NDP policies."

Also running in Oriole are Shelly Lipsey for the Green Party, and independents Bernadette Michael, Kirk Moss and Jeff Pancer.

Rescue

"Whenever and wherever Jews face danger, UJA Federation is there. Since 1989, we've helped to rescue over 800,000 Jews from places such as Sarajevo, Chechnya and other parts of the former Soviet Union. But thousands more are waiting at the gate. And they call out 'Remember us.'"

For Alexander Bursik, leaving Ukraine was, in a strange way, a tribute to his father, who died because modern medicine wasn't available to save his life. Alexander no longer wanted to stay in a country just catching up with quality health care available elsewhere. When he saw no future for himself in Ukraine, Alexander, assisted by the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency, headed to Israel with only a small suitcase in hand and a glitter of hope in his eyes. "I want my mother to join me here someday so we can live in a place where our dreams can be fulfilled. This will have made my father proud."

Dignifying Lives

"The poor among us. More than 20,000 Jews in the Greater Toronto Area live below the poverty line. They're the hidden 13% of our population. For them tzedakah means more than charity. It means our responsibility, as Jews, to each other, exemplified by UJA Federation."

Only a few years ago, Rochelle and her husband Zvi were doing well, with a comfortable home in a middle class Jewish neighbourhood. There was money to spare for restaurant meals, a night out and a yearly vacation. Then financial disaster struck. A pregnant Rochelle quit her secretarial job. Zvi's business slid into bankruptcy. The couple lost their home. That's when Jewish Family & Child Service stepped in through the UJA Federation funded supplementary financial assistance program, counselling and help in finding a subsidized apartment. Today, Zvi is studying computers and Rochelle is learning business administration. Although they're still living below the poverty line, Rochelle and Zvi, thanks to JF&CS and UJA Federation, have more than money. They have their dignity.

Forever.

Preserving Our Identity

"Safeguarding our Jewish heritage starts with us. Each and every one of us. Only when we know who we are can we pass on our sense of identity to our children and grandchildren.

When Tilly Shames started her first year at York University, Jewish involvement was the last thing on her mind. Her pursuit of an environmental studies degree was Tilly's most important priority. "I had no specific Jewish interest,"she says. "But I wanted to see what Jewish programming had to do with environmental studies — what the connection was, if there was one at all." So, Tilly found herself at a special Jewish Students Federation event, celebrating the holiday of Tu B'shvat. Now, thanks to JSF, a member of Jewish Campus Services, supported by UJA Federation, Tilly has developed a new attitude toward Judaism. "My perspective has completely changed. I see new avenues and roots to Judaism, beyond the traditional framework. That's what Jewish Campus Services provided for me and thousands of other students."

York literary magazine a forum for student creativity

By SHIRA HONIG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The sunlight streams through the large windows of the apartment, where Sidura Ludwig sits, talking animatedly about how the idea for Dorot first originated.

"I was at a Hillel Leadership Convention in 1995, and I was talking with a guy from San Francisco whose Hillel put out this Jewish student magazine, a literary magazine. And I was really struck by the idea because I'd always wanted to find a way to combine my interests in creative writing and Judaism. So when I came back, I approached the people I thought would be able to help me with it – and people got really excited."

As editor-in-chief of Dorot, the Jewish student literary magazine based at York University, Ludwig has watched, over the past year, as her hard work and the work of editors Janna Cohen, Dave Gordon and Moishe Weinberg, culminated in the first three issues.

She has seen it grow from a journal with a few submissions of poetry and prose to a more substantial version that includes photographs. What she likes best about it, she says, is the wide spectrum the publication can present to the Jewish student population.

"I think we're unique in that way. I've never seen a Jewish publication that's been able to include so many different opinions, all under one cover. And I'm really happy with that, because that's what I wanted to do from the beginning."

There is no question diversity is one of Dorot's strongest points. Its mandate is to publish Jewish-themed fiction and non-fiction, regardless of the author's own heritage. This allows the magazine to attract everyone, from those already intensely involved in Jewish campus groups to those who are not Jewish themselves.

And then there are contributors who aren't even submitting pieces from Toronto. "One [of the submissions] came from Maryland and two came from Toronto students studying in Israel. There's an eclectic mix in the newest edition," Gordon says.

> 'I think we're unique in a way'

Perhaps the most important in this mix are those who are Jewish but who have never actively participated in their community before. "We get people submitting to us who have never been involved in the Jewish community at all," Ludwig says. "They've always felt that... they don't fit in. And all of a sudden, there's this magazine that wants to hear their voice, that cares for both the secular and religious Jew."

The outcome is a student publication with a variety of topics. Volume 3, for example, contains poetry questioning G-d's inconceivable ways, as well as short stories mourning the deaths of friends and relations. It also contains a piece entitled Noah's Territory by Alexis Nicols, a piece which, Gordon says, some people have found offensive "by virtue of the fact that it has overt sexual content."

Yet controversy, he says, is not something Dorot is going to shy away from, as long as a given piece has a Jewish theme and is unanimously deemed by its editors to be of high quality.

Three pieces in particular that I believe stand out for their innovation and strong writing are Untitled by Barbi Price, Tongue-Tied by Debra Anderson and Familiar Faux Pas by Carolyn McLean Schwartz, one of Dorot's newest editors.

Ludwig, whose own poem in this volume entitled in healing mud is rich with vivid images, points out that not everyone who submits is a creative writing student as she is.

"You know, we have some really talented students out there, [and] it's difficult to get published. So we're able to give them a voice for their voice," she says.

Lenny Cohen, another new Dorot editor and creative writing student who is also impressed with the magazine's high standards says he is traditionalist. What does he mean by traditional? "That it's stylistically well done. A lot of [the writing in Dorot] is quite clever — that's something I like to see generally."

One story which fits this criterion is entitled You Only Die Once by Alberto Maggi. You Only Die Once, in Dorot's second volume, painstakingly describes the delicate balance between finding a kindred spirit and losing your own identity in the process. Though the narrator is a Jew named Michael Gould, the tale is a universal one, woven with beautiful, intimate detail and realistic dialogue.

Both Cohen, who is filling the spot left by Weinberg's departure in May, and Ludwig agree that the quality of Dorot's writing can be further improved as its readership, and hence the number of submissions, increase. Ludwig plans to continue distributing the magazine to students at York as well as at Ryerson and the University of Toronto in the hope that in a few months, there will be a larger response from the downtown schools.

Cohen and Ludwig are both excited about the prospect of having more writing to choose from.

Because it is a non-profit publication, funded in part by Jewish Campus Services and the Zuckerman Charitable Foundation, Dorot is a free publication that has many people behind it, including Zac Kaye, director of Jewish Campus Services and Beta Reproductions, which reproduces the photographs appearing in Dorot's pages.

UIA rescue & renewal

Mission to Baku stirs emotions

When a group of Canadians recently traveled thousands of miles to the former Soviet Union to meet the Jews of Baku, Azerbaijan, what they saw profoundly affected them.

The special mission was organized by United Israel Appeal of Canada, which through local Federation campaigns, funds the rescue of Jews living in unstable parts of the world, primarily the former Soviet Union. Since 1989, the UIA funded Jewish Agency has brought 800,000 Jewish men, women and children to Israel to begin new lives.

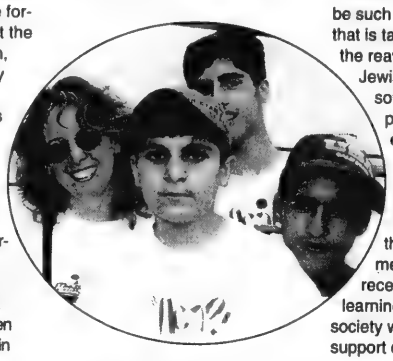
Participants from across Canada visited Jewish Agency summer camps, Hebrew classes for children and adults planning to make aliya and youth clubs with year long cultural programs. The group also journeyed to the remote village of Kuba where 5,000 Jews continue to live much the same way their ancestors did hundreds of years ago.

"This is the most dramatic way to show members of our community how UIA dollars are being spent," said UIA Canada President Harvey Wolfe. "This is my 4th trip to the FSU," added Wolfe, "and I continue to be inspired by the remarkable accomplishments and sacrifice of the Jewish Agency emissaries."

"Seeing children singing Hebrew songs and performing Israeli dances at the summer camp outside Baku made me realize my contribution is being well spent," observed Bonnie Loewith from Hamilton. "It made me feel like a part of Jewish history in the making."

"The spirit of the children is unbelievable," noted Montreal's Rosalyn Wolfe. "For many it is their first positive encounter with Judaism and Israel – and the first step toward aliya."

"I didn't expect to see what I saw," recounted Mendy Sharf of Toronto. "But it became clearer than ever that we must get as many people out while we have the opportunity. Tomorrow might be too late."



"I am so proud that we, Canadian Jews, are able to be such an integral part of all that is taking place, including the reawakening of Jewishness in the hearts, souls and minds of the people of the FSU," explained Montreal's Stanley Plotnick, President of Federation CJA.

On the second leg of the mission, the group met with hundreds of recent olim from the FSU learning to adapt to Israeli society with the guidance and support of Jewish Agency absorption centres.

"Our participants had the chance to see both sides of the remarkable process from the very beginning to the ultimate goal of arriving in Israel," explained Steve Ain, Executive Vice-President of UIA, Canada. "It made the whole story of aliya a reality."

Jewish Agency moves mountain Jews

For the mountain Jews living in the former Soviet republic of Azerbaijan, life is difficult and full of uncertainty. Thanks to the heroic efforts of the Jewish Agency for Israel, funded by United Israel Appeal through UJA/CJA campaigns, they are not struggling alone.

Since 1989, the Jewish Agency has helped more than 27,000 Jews make aliya to Israel from the Muslim republic, but the 26,000 who still remain are, at best, barely earning a living.

"It's a terrible situation," explains Baruch Gur, the architect of Operation Exodus which brought 800,000 Jews from the FSU and other unstable regions to Israel and UIA's emissary to Toronto. "These people can't find steady work and those who do start small businesses are finding paying customers scarce." The average monthly salary is a mere $30.

Political uncertainty is also a factor leading to the Jewish emgiration. "In the last six years Azerbaijan has had two revolutions, civil war, a major war with Armenia and four presidents," notes Gur. "While the present government is allowing Jews to leave, who knows what will happen next year, or next month for that matter?"

Jewish life is sustained, in large part, through the work of Jewish Agency emissaries and staff. Although there are three synagogues in Baku and two in the remote village of Kuba where some 5,000 Jews live, Jewish Agency summer camps, Hebrew classes and youth groups are where Jewish culture thrives in Azerbaijan today.

"Our main goal," explains David Nir, the man in charge of Jewish Agency operations in Baku, is to get the children out. "There is no future for them here," he said in an interview from his Baku office.

"By engaging the youth and exposing them to Jewish culture and Israel we create a lasting connection that draws many to make aliya."

The Naaleh 16 program, which offers 16 years olds three years of study in Israel, is currently the most successful aliya program. Since its start, in 1994, more than 97% of the 5,000 teenagers who participated in Naaleh 16 have stayed permanently in Israel. More than 35% of their parents have joined them.

"The quality of these young people is remarkable," notes Steve Ain, Executive Vice-President of UIA Canada. "They represent the crème de la crème of Jewish youth – they are indeed the best and the brightest."

Each month between 200 and 250 Jews make aliya from Azerbaijan, either as families or as individuals through Jewish Agency programs.

UIA rescue & renewal, a supplement of the Canadian Jewish News, is sponsored by UIA of Canada.

Crown stays charges in hate murder case

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg police and Manitoba Crown prosecutors are still batting zero when it comes to prosecuting hate-related crimes.

Second-degree murder charges against four alleged racist skinheads collapsed earlier this month because a key witness who claimed to have been with the accused on the evening of June 30, 1991, when Gordon Kuhtey was beaten to death, was actually living in Vancouver at the time.

Matt McKay, 26, James Lisik, 23, Robert Welsh, 25, and Garry Kuffner, 28, were arrested in March 1996, and charged with Kuhtey's murder after a skinhead talked about it at a drinking party in British Columbia.

All four men were alleged to have been connected to the racist and violent Northern Hammerskins and other neo-Nazi groups.

They were alleged to have set out that evening to beat up a gay man, and picked on Kuhtey because he was walking alone near the Manitoba Legislature, in an area reputed to be frequented by gay men.

Last week, the Crown stayed charges against Kuffner and Welsh. A week earlier, charges against Lisik and McKay were also stayed.

Although police claimed to have confessions from Kuffner and Welsh, the judge ruled that the confessions alone were not enough to sustain a case that was riddled with inconsistencies, in addition to the key witness's lack of credibility.

Both Winnipeg Police Chief David Cassels and Crown prosecutors have vowed to conduct reviews of their departments to try to determine what went wrong.

Saul Simmonds, Lisik's lawyer and the president of the Manitoba Criminal Lawyers Association, suggests the case collapsed because of the Crown's rush to judgment, rather than holding a preliminary inquiry first.

"Direct indictments have been happening with increasing frequency in Manitoba and they should not be," Simmonds says. "A preliminary inquiry tests the credibility of witnesses early on and can pinpoint weaknesses in a prosecution. A case that may look good on paper may turn out badly in the courtroom and vice versa.

"Even in cases with racial overtones, in a democratic system, there are lines you can't cross just because people are reacting to the offense. The investigation has to follow a proper path. Leads have to be followed even if they point to a suspect's innocence."

Simmonds maintains that the police had enough information to know that the principal witness's claims were inaccurate.

His client spent time in custody awaiting trial, and will be applying to the province for compensation.

Anti-Quebec Internet site slammed by Congress

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Both the Quebec government and Jewish community organizations last week denounced the presence of an Internet site discovered in Vancouver comparing Quebec to Nazi Germany.

But a Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) official said culture minister Louise Beaudoin, who is advocating the enforcement of hate propaganda laws, should also have them apply to figures like Raymond Villeneuve, a radical separatist who last year warned of retaliation against the Jewish community for working against sovereignty.

"If you want to pursue propagators of hate, you can start with Villeneuve, not an anonymous individual in Vancouver," said CJC-Q executive director Jack Jedwab.

Jedwab was responding to comments Beaudoin made to reporters last Wednesday describing the Internet site – entitled Quebec, North America's Neo-Fascist State – as an insult to Quebec nationalists and Jews.

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Sol Littman in Toronto issued a statement calling the Quebec-Nazi analogy, "stupid, vicious, and show[ing] a total lack of understanding of the nature of Quebec."

Beaudoin said she agreed with the centre's view, "that it is an insult to the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust and it is also an insult to Quebec nationalists."

Similarly, Jedwab said, "we obviously reject those analogies."

The site, originally traced to Vancouver, closed down after the media reported on it but reopened again on a Web page originating in California.

Besides drawing parallels between Quebec and Nazi Germany, the site also compares Premier Lucien Bouchard to Adolf Hitler and says Quebec only welcomes immigrants who are white and don't speak English.

The anonymous author of the site refers to himself only as, "The Ministry of Truth."

According to CJC-Q community relations policy associate Marc Anderson, a solution to hate on the Internet might lie in a report on the Internet might lie in a report on the Information Highway, Culture and Democracy issued by Beaudoin's own ministry in May.

Anderson said the report appeared to endorse an approach advocated in a CJC-Q brief last September that said Canadian law vis-a-vis- hate propaganda should apply not only to individual "providers," but to "servers."

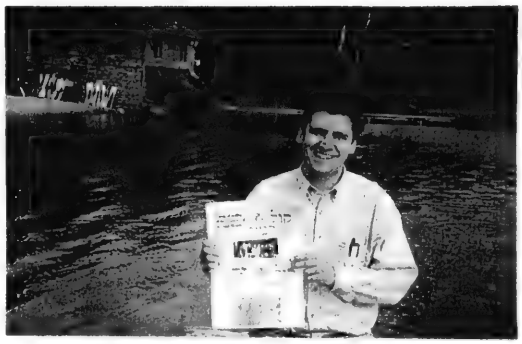
Journalist adds 'wow!' to Camp Ramah experience

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter



Robert Sarner, editor of Kol Ramah.

UTTERSON, ONT. — Kol Ramah, an eight-page tabloid-size newspaper with a generous sprinkling of color pictures, is a far cry from the modest newsletter issued by Camp Ramah last year.

Robert Sarner, 43, a Toronto-born journalist who has lived in Israel for almost seven years, returned here as a shaliach this year to create and edit the paper.

The shlichut was part of a package deal. Sarner's wife Galya, a Jerusalem-born special education teacher, heard from a colleague about the Jewish Agency program that sends shlichim to over 100 Zionist summer camps in North America. The shlichim are placed according to their skills and the camps' needs.

Of Ramah's 150 staff members, 18 are Israeli shlichim, apparently the largest delegation at any Canadian summer camp.

The Sarners came to the 38-year-old Conservative camp en famille – Robert, Galya, and their three children, age 9, 7 and 4. Galya was the Hebrew program coordinator and Robert ran the newspaper chug (hobby hub). Copies of Kol Ramah came out every other Friday this summer.

Camp director Rabbi Mitch Cohen wasn't looking to have a newspaper at the camp, he said, but he liked the idea of trying something new. He had received positive feedback about the Sarners from the person who had interviewed them in Israel. "I thought it would be worth taking a chance."

Every summer, the rabbi likes to introduce "at least two new things that kids will say 'Wow!' to." The other innovation this year was a 30-foot-high climbing wall.

Rabbi Cohen didn't know exactly what to expect from the newspaper. "I thought it would be an expanded version of our newsletter. When I first saw it, I was absolutely blown away."

Regular features include an advice column, a "notice board" and letters to the editor. Among the subjects of recent articles were camp food, romance among the staffers (three engaged couples), and Ramah's Tikvah program for teens and young adults with cognitive disabilities.

"To my knowledge, a real newspaper had never been done at a camp," said Sarner. "This is like a little town for two months. As such, it should be able to support a newspaper."

Although parents, camp visitors and about 550 campers over the course of the summer received the paper, Sarner "did not want it to be a glorified marketing vehicle. I did want to keep a journalistic feel to it. I also wanted to have some fun, and at times to show that Ramah is not a perfect environment."

He credited the camp director for being supportive of his ideas. "I don't take that for granted."

Kol Ramah has generated "so much positive feedback from the kids at camp and also from the parents," said Rabbi Cohen. "Our goal was marketing, fun and education, and I think we've more than exceeded our goals."

Discussions are under way about the possibility of publishing the paper over the winter, with Sarner editing online from Israel.

In his other life, Sarner is a reporter and anchor on Israeli national television's only daily English-language newscast. Most of his professional background, however, is in print journalism. In 1981, he founded Paris Passion, then the only English-language city magazine in the French capital, and edited it for almost a decade before making aliyah.

More recently, he worked undercover with New York detective Steve Rambam and a journalist colleague investigating suspected Nazi war criminals in Canada. The result was a two-part series in the Jerusalem Post, a newspaper for which he once worked as editor of its weekly magazine.

Teaching the basics of reporting in the newspaper chug has been a new experience for him. "I love kids. These are tremendous kids, very motivated...It's been great fun."

Windsor man seeks to restore cemetery in Ukraine

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Windsor man is appealing to Jews who survived the ghetto in the eastern Polish city of Stanislavov to help save the local Jewish cemetery.

According to Adam Friedland, whose friend in Israel heads the Organization of Former Inhabitants of Stanislavov and Region, thousands of Jews were slaughtered at the cemetery during the town's occupation by the Nazis, beginning in 1941.

As well, thousands more had been buried there before the war.

In all, it's estimated that 120,000 Jews are interred in the cemetery, many in mass graves.

The city is now called Ivanov-Frankovsk and is in western Ukraine. The government of Ukraine recently designated the cemetery a historic site but did not donate any money toward its restoration.

During the German occupation, some 200 Jewish headstones were removed from the cemetery and used to pave a square in the town. Today, the headstones are trod on every day, and the committee in Israel wants them moved back to the cemetery.

According to Friedland, the graveyard is in a terrible state of repair, with overgrown grass and weeds everywhere. Goats and other animals regularly graze there.

He says Israel has contributed about $18,000 toward the restoration, and a further $50,000 has come from a private donor. But at least $80,000 is needed, he says.

Apart from grading and weeding, plans call for a concrete fence to surround the cemetery, and a memorial to the Jews murdered there.

Over 10,000 Jews were slaughtered at the cemetery in a single aktion, in October, 1941. The murder of the remainder of the community, which had dwindled to roughly 8,000 — was carried out at the cemetery in 1943.

It's estimated that 1,500 Jews from Stanislavov survived the Holocaust.

The committee in Israel is composed of several prominent people, including a retired judge and an army general. Anyone interested is urged to contact: Pinchas Goldenzeil, Irgun Yotzey Stanislavov, 14, Shd. Hayeled, Ramat-Gan, 52444, Israel.

Tragic scene: Goats relax amid run-down Jewish graves in the cemetery in the Ukrainian city of Ivano-Frankovsk, formerly Stanislavov in Poland.

TORONTO — The business that began in Marc Gordon's basement in 1990 with a startoff cost of $2,500 has turned into 14-karat gold-plated industry.

Gordon, 27, owner of GoldPro Canada, manufacturer of gold plating equipment, chemicals and supplies, sells primarily to the automobile industry for gold-plating emblems on cars.

With representatives in 14 countries including Australia, New Zealand, Austria, Germany, Saudi Arabia and Malta (which covers Italy and Greece), GoldPro has increased its sales from $5,000 in 1990 to $200,000 locally and half a million dollars worldwide today. In Ontario the country is represented by Co-Auto Co-Operative Inc., a buying organization made up of automobile dealerships from across the province.

Gordon, a graduate of business administration from Seneca College, says he got into the automotive parts business "by accident" at age 16, when, as a racer of dune buggies, he began importing the shock absorbers, wheels and engine parts he couldn't get here.

"I approached the U.S. companies to distribute their products out of need. I had no intention of going into business. People, though, were interested in the parts and by the time I graduated high school, I found myself in classes during the day and making deliveries at night."

By 1988, however, competition became too stiff, says Gordon. "I concentrated on my studies and worked for a few companies until I came across these gold-plating machines at a trade show. I began importing them and as volume grew, started to manufacture the machines myself. Many of my distributors found me through my listing on a Canadian government database, available to exporters."

As the company's only full-time employee, Gordon says all his sales people are independent agents or distributors.

"The equipment is made by a subcontractor in Rexdale and then shipped to car dealers or home renovators who may use the equipment for gold-plating faucets. We're even beginning to gold-plate jewelry."

Automobile dealers, he says, purchase a GoldPro system and "then offer [the gold package] to customers as an upgrade on their new car. Unlike many upgrade features, dealers do not need specific models for different cars. A gold-plating system can plate any automobile in a short time."

GoldPro gold solutions, he says, have received ISO 9001 certification and its other chemicals have received ISO 9000 certification.

"This means that the manufacturing and distributing process meets a set of standards set forth by the International Standards Organization of Geneva, Switzerland. All gold solutions contain a minimum of 21 grams net of 24-karat gold per litre. Colored golds, which contain a minimum of 12 grams of 24-karat gold per litre, produce such colors as red, bright yellow (which resembles polished brass) and midnight pearl, resembling black chrome."

Child care business offers solutions

By REVA KAISER
Student Intern

TORONTO — Claudette Roth had spent 20 years working in the child care field when she decided to take her wealth of knowledge and expertise and apply them to an innovative business of her own.

Child Care Solutions is a company that assists parents in choosing the best type of care for their children. Registered in March 1997, it is one of only two such services in Toronto, she says.

Roth works with parents to find the best care for their children. It is a one-person operation, so there are no intermediaries. She works directly with the parents and does all research on the possible care options.

She looks at each family's unique needs. It's not always the best decision to use a day care or nanny based on recommendation, because people interact differently with others, she says. Just because one set of parents is happy, it doesn't mean that another will also be, Roth adds.

"I am an advocate for the parents, not an agency with a pool of nannies... First I try to understand what the parent needs and then I go and find it."

At the initial interview, parents complete a questionnaire asking such details as work location (relative to home); work hours; budget allotted for care; specific needs for the child or parent and any other relative factor.

Roth will then do all of the leg work — from placing ads to conducting interviews (for nannies) and compiling the short list.

When investigating day care centres, Roth will cut the list of contenders down to three, and then visit each one with the parent to see the facilities and observe the interactions between staff and children. She has her own checklist to ensure that the day cares are of top quality.

Roth charges $60 an hour for her services, but provides three package deals.

The Home Care Provider, which is child care in an individual's home, costs $200 and includes three evaluations and a written report.

The Nanny/ Babysitter package, which costs $225, includes three evaluations, a written report and an ad to recruit applicants.

The Child Care Centre package costs $225 and includes three centre evaluations and a written report.

Roth contends that the fees are reasonable, considering the amount of work involved, as well as the valuable input from an experienced child care worker.

Part of Child Cares Solutions' policy is to maintain contact with the parents after they have chosen the most ideal form of child care, and ensure that there is a continual follow-up.

Aside from her 20 years of working experience, Roth is personally familiar with children's requirements and different child care options. She is the mother of two grown children, one of whom she put into day care at the age of three.

Israeli soldier admits to killing British tourist

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israelis have reacted with shock to the news that an Israeli soldier, not a terrorist, was behind the recent murder of a British tourist.

Israeli police arrested Maj. Daniel Okev, a reserve army officer who admitted to the Aug. 13 murder of Jeffrey Hunter, 22, and the wounding of his girlfriend, Charlotte Gibb.

Although he admitted to picking up the tourists near Eilat and later shooting them, Okev could not offer a motive.

"Maybe I need a doctor," Okev said during a detention hearing last Friday. "Maybe I have a split personality."

A breakthrough in the investigation came when a police officer at a roadblock set up after the murder recalled seeing Okev in a car similar to the one witnesses said they had seen parked in a deserted area that turned out to be the murder scene.

The police officer said that Okev had identified himself as a reserve army officer when he was stopped at the roadblock.

With permission from the district attorney, investigators secretly took Okev's car for examinations that turned up Hunter's fingerprints.

When police came to arrest Okev at his home in Even Yehuda, near Netanya, he surrendered, handing over his gun and saying, "I know why you're here."

Okev, 45, is a father of two.

He left the army several years ago and had been working for a trucking company.

During a re-enactment of the shooting, Okev told police how he had picked up the two tourists near Eilat and began driving north.

He said that after driving for a while, he pulled the car over and they got out to smoke and drink some water.

Okev said the conversation was pleasant and that there had been no argument.

He said that when they returned to the car, he got in first, pulling his pistol out from under the seat where he kept it.

"All I remember after that is that they were then lying on the ground," Okev said. "I don't know how many times I fired."

Okev left the scene and drove back to Eilat, where he was stopped at the roadblock and allowed to go on. Hunter and Gibb were found by a passing car.

Okev's attorney, David Yiftah, argued that his client was temporarily insane at the time of the shooting and should not be held responsible.

"I don't think we are dealing with a conventional crime carried out by a hardened criminal," he said. "We are dealing here with an army officer, a decent citizen, a loyal family man. As we know, Daniel Okev had no motive for committing murder and does not recall shooting the victims," Yiftah told Israel Radio.

Police rejected the argument, and Okev was placed in custody for 15 days.

The family of the murder victim has been sharply critical of the treatment they received from both Israeli and British authorities.

Norman Hunter, Jeffrey's father, told the Israeli daily Ha'aretz that the authorities in Israel and Britain had offered no help – logistical, financial or otherwise – in transferring the body back home.

He said he learned of the arrest of a suspect by chance, when he went to visit his slain son's wounded girlfriend in a hospital in Cambridge, England.

Israel searching for missing soldier

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The IDF has been conducting searches in the Golan Heights for an Israeli soldier reported missing last week.

Police said the soldier, Guy Hever, 20, left his base in the north last week in his uniform and carrying his army-issued rifle.

His family said Hever was unhappy at the base and had left suddenly.

Police said they were investigating all possible explanations, including a possible terrorist kidnapping, murder or suicide.

Another Israeli soldier, Sharon Edri, disappeared in central Israel last year after leaving a base on his way home.

In April, Israeli security forces, acting on information obtained in part from Palestinian police, found Edri's body buried in the West Bank village of Tsurif, near Hebron.

IDF officials said at the time that Edri was killed by members of a cell of the Hamas military wing that had been responsible for murdering 10 other Israelis and wounding 49 in attacks since the beginning of 1996.

The Week in Israel

Aug. 18

• A member of the Israeli Knesset said the government should pay the costs if any Yemenite family wants to open a grave to verify the death of a child. Some graves were found empty during an investigation into the allegation that infants were stolen in the '40s and '50s and given to European families who arrived in Israel childless after the war.

Aug. 19

• Tests conducted by the Israeli Environment Ministry on samples from the Yarkon River into which Australian Maccabiah members fell did not show any signs of radioactivity, although the water was found to be poisoned by industrial waste.

• Israeli archeologists discovered a mass grave in the Galilee dating from a Jewish revolt against the Romans in 67 BCE. The discovery appears to confirm reports of the Jewish historian Flavius Josephus.

Aug. 20

• The Syrian army has deployed tanks in forward positions near the Golan Heights, Jane's Defense Weekly reported. The report follows a claim by Israel's American ambassador, Eliyahu Ben-Elissar, that Syria is preparing for war.

• Israel released $12 million, one-third of the tax revenues it has withheld from the Palestinian Authority (PA) since the bombing in Jerusalem. This came after the PA assisted in the investigation of the attack and the conviction of three Palestinians who murdered a Jerusalem taxi driver.

Aug. 21

• Palestinians began enforcing a boycott of Israeli goods, turning back trucks from the West Bank. Merchants could not sell Israeli goods beyond what they had on their shelves.

Aug. 22

• Labor party chair Ehud Barak fired more than half the staff at party headquarters, citing a NIS 80 million debt.

• Israeli media reported on fighting in southern Lebanon between the IDF, SLA, and Hezbollah, after an IDF soldier was wounded and a Lebanese man killed.

Iran remains hostile

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mohammed Khatami, the new president of Iran, won the approval of parliament last week for his cabinet.

Mideast Analysis

Khatami is considered a moderate with respect to domestic and foreign policy. But when it comes to Israel, he is as venomous as any mainstream Islamic politician in Tehran. The prospect of a rapprochement between Iran and Israel, therefore, is as remote as ever.

Shortly after Khatami's election in May, Foreign Minister David Levy urged Iran to reassess its hostile attitude to Israel. Iran neither accepts Israel's existence nor supports the peace process in the Middle East. But at his first press conference, Khatami, a cleric, branded Israel as a "racist" state which has imposed its "illegitimate hegemony" on the Palestinians.

When he was installed as president earlier this month, Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs called on Iran "to open up a new page in its relations with all of its neighbors..." Within days, Iran responded by tightening restrictions on the distribution of Iranian films abroad. The curbs were introduced after two Iranian movies found their way to a recent festival in Jerusalem. The screenings were denounced as a "plot hatched by Europe and the illegal state of Israel."

Iran has been consistently antagonistic toward Israel since the 1979 Islamic revolution. Before that, Israel had a discreet relationship with Iran, ruled by a pro-Western monarchy which paid lip service to the Palestinian cause. But with the rise of a new order in Tehran, Iran severed diplomatic relations with Israel and then promptly invited the PLO to seize Israel's embassy.

In the view of scholars, the Arab-Israeli conflict provides Iran with an opportunity to bolster its Islamic credentials and to exercise regional leadership.

Though geographically far from the Arab-Israeli arena, Iran has made its presence felt by its vehement opposition to the peace process and by its support of Hezbollah in Lebanon.

In October 1991, the Iranian government organized a meeting, attended by Palestinian rejectionists, to coincide with the Madrid peace conference. When Israel and the PLO signed the Declaration of Principles in September 1993, Iran convened another anti-peace conference and promised "limitless support" to opponents of "this shameful accord."

Iran, which reportedly holds Israeli aviator Ron Arad, backs Hamas and Islamic Jihad and regards suicide bombings as acts of martyrdom designed to secure the legitimate rights of the Palestinians.

Given Tehran's record, Yitzhak Rabin demonized Iran as the eminence grise of Islamic fundamentalism, while Shimon Peres and Yasser Arafat accused Iran of being behind the spate of terrorism in Israel in the winter of 1996. (Lately, however, Arafat has improved his relations with Iran).

Since the 1980s, Iran has been Hezbollah's chief arms provider. In the wake of Israel's massive 16-day bombardment of Lebanon in April 1996, Iran replenished Hezbollah's supply of Katyushas via an airlift through Damascus. With these rockets, Hezbollah hit the Galilee last week.

Of late, Iran has fortified its links with Syria. Last December, Khatami's predecessor, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, sent a message to President Hafez al-Assad promising military aid in case of war between Israel and Syria. More recently, Assad made his first visit to Tehran in 18 years, and he and Khatami denounced Israel's growing military ties with Turkey.

Iran itself has embarked on a quest to strengthen its armed forces, which were mauled in the war with Iraq from 1980 to 1988. According to a recent study published by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, Iranian Military Power, Iran is trying to build up its conventional forces and to develop or acquire nuclear weapons.

Several months ago, Iran staged its largest-ever military exercises, dubbed Road to Jerusalem, and tested a long-range missile capable of striking Israel. For good reason, Israel regards Iran warily.

Tension high in Lebanon after continued fighting

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The deteriorating situation in southern Lebanon was marked by fierce fighting over the weekend between Israeli forces and Hezbollah gunmen.

The IDF said at least two Hezbollah fighters were killed last Saturday when Israeli forces repelled an unsuccessful attempt to attack an Israeli army outpost close to the northern border.

According to reports, the Israeli forces spotted the fighters as they tried to approach the outpost

The IDF troops gave chase and opened fire; killing the Hezbollah gunmen. There were no Israeli casualties.

An Israeli soldier inspects a home after it was hit by a Hezbollah-fired rocket last week. Dozens of rockets from Lebanon slammed into northern Israel, as fighting intensfied. [RNS/Reuters Photo]

During the pursuit, Hezbollah directed mortar fire at the Israeli troops in an effort to give the retreating Hezbollah unit cover.

Saturday's fighting, the latest during a week of tit for tat escalations, reportedly took place after a Hezbollah rocket attack on an Israeli position in the southern Lebanon security zone.

Although there was no fighting reported last Sunday, Israeli military officials warned that Hezbollah might try to retaliate for the losses of the previous day with long-range fire at Israeli positions in the security zone and with possible rocket attacks on northern Israel.

Last week, Hezbollah launched its heaviest Katyusha rocket attack on northern Israel since April 1996, when a U.S.-brokered ceasefire brought an end to more than two weeks of cross-border fighting.

No Israelis were killed in the Aug. 19 attack, which Hezbollah launched to avenge the shelling a day earlier of the Lebanese port city of Sidon by Israel's ally, the South Lebanon Army (SLA). At least six people were reported killed in that attack.

Meanwhile, the five-nation committee monitoring the ceasefire issued a statement regarding the SLA's shelling of Sidon and the Hezbollah Katyusha attacks on northern Israel.

The committee called on both Israel and Lebanon to work to prevent attacks on civilians.

For the first time, the committee said it was essential for the Lebanese government to keep groups from carrying out attacks on Israel.

While the committee did not accept Lebanon's request to blame Israel for the SLA shelling of Sidon, it said the IDF must prevent the SLA from carrying out such attacks.

The United States sent messages to Syria, Israel and Lebanon over the weekend requesting that the sides work to calm tensions in the region.

Palestinians stone soldiers

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Some 300 Palestinians took part in a march on an IDF post near Rachel's Tomb outside of Bethlehem last Saturday to protest the continued closure of the town.

IDF troops responded with tear gas and rubber bullets when some of the several dozen youths who arrived at the tomb threw stones at them.

Many of the youths wore kaffiyehs to hide their faces. Some of the protesters burned an Israeli flag. A similar protest by Fatah, including kaffiyeh-wearing youths carrying automatic weapons, was held in the Palestinian-controlled section of Hebron to protest Israeli policies.

Palestinian police wearing gas masks looked on but did not intervene. No injuries were reported.

Israel has continued the internal closure on Bethlehem and its suburbs, after lifting the closure from all other West Bank towns more than a week ago. This is a result of reports that the explosives used in the Machane Yehuda bombing may have come from a bomb factory discovered in Beit Sahur, which is near Bethlehem, and that the second most wanted Islamic terror planner, Moheddin Sherif, was hiding in the town.

The Bethlehem march was joined by senior local officials, who complained that the continued closure was destroying tourism and business.

"They will lift the closure or we will burn the ground underneath their feet," one masked youth told Reuters.

An IDF spokesperson said a "few dozen" Palestinian demonstrators moved on Rachel's Tomb and hurled stones at security forces and worshippers there. The soldiers and Border Police fired tear gas and rubber bullets to disperse them and the army said they had no reports of any casualties.

German insurers consider compensation

By DEIDRE BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

FRANKFURT — A national German insurance association has announced that it may establish a general compensation fund for Holocaust survivors and their heirs.

A spokesperson for the association, Gesamtverband der Deutschen Versicherungswirtschaft, told a German radio network that a decision will be made after member companies investigate the extent of open claims.

Two class action suits against 16 European insurance companies have been filed in New York courts on behalf of more than 20,000 people who claim the firms never paid out on policies that were opened by European Jews before World War II.

The claimants are seeking $16 billion in restitution from the insurers.

After the war, Holocaust survivors and their heirs were unable to collect on insurance policies taken out by relatives who died during the war, in part due to a lack of documentation.

In the past, insurance companies often asserted the policies lost legal validity because of the lack of premiums paid by the policy holders during the war.

They also claimed that restitution payments made by Germany to the governments of countries formerly occupied by the Nazis covered individual compensation claims.

The largest of the insurance companies, the Munich-based Allianz Group, set up an international hotline earlier this year to collect information about unpaid policies.

The company has received hundreds of calls, but says it has only located 14 unpaid policies so far with the information given by callers.

Allianz has also commissioned the Arthur Anderson auditing firm to go through all files dating back to the pre-war era to locate unpaid policies, and has appointed a history professor to write a history of the company's activities during the Third Reich.

Recently, two Holocaust survivors who live in New York protested in Munich at the headquarters of Allianz and the German branch of the Italian insurance company, Assicurazioni Generali, to demand a speedy resolution of their claims.

Lileikis may face trial

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VILNIUS, Lithuania — An accused Nazi war criminal who was stripped of his U.S. citizenship before returning to Lithuania may finally stand trial here later this year.

Legal proceedings against Aleksandras Lileikis were postponed last month after medical experts determined that he was not fit to stand trial. Under Lithuanian law, suspects cannot be brought to trial if medical experts rule that they are too ill.

Emmanuel Zingeris, the only Jewish member of the 141-seat parliament, recently launched a campaign to change that law. His amendment will be introduced next month after the parliament returns from recess.

Lileikis, 90, is accused of having handed Jews over to death squads in Vilnius during World War II when he was head of the Nazi-sponsored Lithuanian security police, known as the Saugumas, from 1941 to 1944.

Some 55,000 of Vilnius' 60,000 Jews perished during the war.

Leaders of the Lithuanian Jewish community say that the tragedy of Vilnius' Jewry, one of Europe's most vibrant Jewish communities, remains practically unknown in Lithuania.

"The Lileikis case has an important educational meaning for this country's history and future," Zingeris said.

Lileikis, who immigrated to the United States in 1955, was stripped of his U.S. citizenship in May. He returned to Lithuania a month later, proclaiming that he was innocent.

He was to have been indicted for genocide shortly after his return. But no charges have been filed.

The Lithuanian prosecutor general's statement last month that the case will go to court "as soon as Lileikis recovers" has outraged Nazi hunters abroad.

They maintain that the Lithuanian government has been moving too slowly in prosecuting Lileikis and other alleged war criminals.

According to Efraim Zuroff, director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's office in Israel, Lithuanian President Algirdas Brazauskas' pledge, made during a 1995 visit to Israel, to prosecute alleged war criminals stands as a hollow declaration.

There are currently at least five Lithuanians living in their homeland who have been stripped of their American citizenship, and American prosecutors are building cases against several more.

No Reform in religious council, minister says

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Incoming Religious Affairs Minister Zevulun Hammer has made it clear that like his predecessor, Eli Suissa, he too would refuse to sign an appointment of a Reform Jew to be a member of a religious council, even if ordered to do so by the High Court.

Hammer, who is also education minister, took over the ministry as part of a rotation agreement between his own National Religious Party (NRP) and Shas. The actual running of the ministry has been entrusted to two deputy ministers, MKs Arye Gamliel of Shas and Yigal Bibi of the NRP.

Hammer was referring to a recent High Court ruling which declared that Dr. Joyce Brenner, a member of the Reform movement, must become a member of the Netanya Religious Council. The High Court ordered the religious affairs minister to sign the announcement to that effect in Reshumot, the official gazette.

The ruling had followed three earlier rulings all intended to ensure that Brenner be made a member of the council, and all of which the ministry had managed to circumvent.

Both Suissa and Gamliel, who is responsible for the religious councils, had refused to sign the announcement and eventually Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu did so as acting religious affairs minister. There had been speculation that Hammer, whose NRP is viewed as religiously more liberal than Shas, might be more amenable to signing similar announcements regarding the appointment of Reform and Conservative Jews to the religious councils of Tel Aviv, Haifa, and Kiryat Tivon, where similar cases have been pending.

"The problem of the Reform is not that of a specific religious affairs minister," Hammer said. "The religious councils are connected to the chief rabbinate of the various cities. I definitely can't sign."

Rabbi Uri Regev, director of the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Centre, said that the choice is not between having or not having Reform members on the religious councils, but between a democratic, law-abiding state and one in which the emasculation of court judgments becomes the norm.

"Not only will there be Reform members on religious councils, but all of Israeli society will be as the majority wants, a democratic state in which the majority rules," Regev said.

Yeshivah funding probe urged

By LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Labor and Meretz parties have demanded an investigation into allegations that some yeshivah students doubled their state stipends, and that haredi schools added fictitious names to their enrolment lists to enhance their government funding.

The parties were reacting to a report on Channel 1, in which reporter Ayala Hasson said she had obtained lists of 80 cases of double funding — students who were enrolled at more than one yeshivah — and 130 cases of fictitious names appearing as registered students.

Without giving a source, Hasson said she had computerized and handwritten lists documenting the cases. She cited an example of the same names and identity numbers appearing as being registered at both the Kamenitz and Yad Yoav yeshivot in Jerusalem.

Meretz leader MK Yossi Sarid and Labor Party whip MK Ra'anan Cohen demanded a probe by state comptroller Miriam Ben-Porat. Cohen also called for introducing legislation that would increase supervision of money allocated to yeshivot.

Groups divided over boycott of Lithuanian events

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — American Jewish groups are divided over whether to boycott the Lithuanian commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the death of the Vilna Gaon.

Several Jewish groups will participate in the commemoration events, which take place from Sept. 9 to 12, while others have withdrawn, said Efraim Zuroff, head of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Jerusalem office. Zuroff has called for a boycott, arguing that the Lithuanian government has backtracked on promises to bring Nazi war criminals to justice and to reverse the rehabilitation of war criminals.

Meanwhile, Lithuanian member of Parliament Rimantas Smetons of the Nationalist party has called for Zuroff's prosecution for slandering the Lithuanian people. At the same time, Culture Minister Saulius Saltenis labeled Zuroff's statements urging a boycott "entirely incomprehensible."

The controversy stems from Zuroff's charge that Lithuania has restored the property rights to and financially compensated 90 Lithuanian war criminals who killed Jews. Furthermore, it has not prosecuted a single war criminal despite assurances by Lithuanian president Algirdas Brazauskas to the Israeli Knesset they would be brought to justice.

Zuroff said, "They're spitting on us and we're supposed to say it's raining."

He suggested the Lithuanian government is cooperating with the Lithuanian Jewish community to sponsor the commemoration honoring the great rabbinic sage "as an easy way of appearing philosemitic."

Zuroff, whose family hails from Lithuania, said the commemoration "is supposed to get them into NATO and the European community and prompt investment by rich Jews."

Despite his pleas, several U.S. Jewish groups are expected to participate in the commemorations. Zuroff said B'nai Brith International, the American Jewish Committee and perhaps the World Jewish Congress will be represented at the event. A number of Orthodox rabbinic groups, including the Rabbinical Council, have pulled out as has the Library of Congress, Judaica section, and the Association of Lithuanian Jews, the worldwide representative body of the Lithuanian Jewish community.

Robin Schwartz-Kreger, a spokesperson for B'nai Brith International (BBI), said the organization has had private conversations with the Lithuanian government on the question of war criminals. BBI is sensitive to Zuroff's concerns, but after consulting with its members in Lithuania, it decided to participate in the commemorations.

"We feel a boycott will hurt the Lithuanian Jews," Schwartz-Kreger said. "This [event] is a source of great pride to them. They'd be upset if we didn't participate."

Meanwhile, Saltenis fired a broadside at Zuroff, saying that "attempts...to employ the notion of collective blame and reiterate Jewish massacre charges against the state of Lithuania and link this with the events devoted to Vilnius Gaon's anniversary can be treated merely as an ill-will effort to spoil good ties between Lithuania and the Jewish nation."

Zuroff responded by saying, "Any attempt to link our call for a boycott to the concept of collective guilt or to describe it as a wholesale indictment of Lithuania or Lithuanians is pure demagoguery. Our opposition to the events...constitutes a legitimate response to the total failure of the Lithuanian government to keep the promises it made to prosecute Nazi murderers and cancel the rehabilitations...The most fitting memorial for the gaon, as well as the more than 200,000 Lithuanian Jews murdered during the Holocaust, is for the Lithuanian government to have the political courage to prosecute those who were responsible for the terrible crimes."

China promises Israel no nuclear assistance to Iran

Naruhito and his wife, Princess Masako, after which he had scheduled a series of meetings with the country's economic and business leaders.

Travelling with a 17-member delegation of business leaders, Netanyahu's main objective is to expand the Japanese market's access to Israeli exports.

He also hopes to exert political influence on Japan's government by explaining his attitude to the peace process, and he hopes to convey these ideas to the general public through a series of interviews with major Japanese television networks and newspapers.

Netanyahu's schedule includes sessions with his Japanese counterpart Ryutaro Hashimoto, the governing Liberal Democratic party, and with the foreign press corps.

Israel is one of the few countries in the world to maintain a favorable balance of trade with Japan. Last year's exports totalled $1.104 billion and imports $1.087 billion.

Japan's purchases of cut diamonds have been a major factor in the economic relationship, but Israeli electronics, telecommunications, software and medical equipment have also been among the main exports to Japan.

Nearly half of Japan's exports to Israel consists of automobiles, and the rest is made up of machinery and electronic equipment.

The Israeli Embassy's report evaluating the Japanese market states that the market can be penetrated only with "specialized products that are of high quality and competitively priced."

The embassy also contends that "the great differences in mentality between the two peoples require more time in reaching local consumers than in other countries.

"Despite this, Israel has developed widespread connections with the Japanese community [which is composed of giant trading companies, industrial firms, banks and investment firms]," the report says.

In recent years, Japan has become the world's second most important market after the United States, according to the embassy evaluation, which was prepared for Netanyahu's visit.

Netanyahu evidently considered the prospects of expanding trade so promising that he waived an opportunity to conduct a formal and official visit next year, in accordance with the Japanese government's strictly budgeted program for such occasions, in favor of a working visit in which his economic and political goals could be pursued without the delays that result from local protocol and bureaucratic norms.

Because of his sacrifice of ceremony in favor of pragmatism, the customary audience with the emperor and empress was rendered impossible. They are away from Tokyo on vacation.

For the love of art, call the Academy of Artisans

Everyone has the creative urge — not only great artists. Nor is art restricted to what you see in galleries. Learn and apply your knowledge, and you too can infuse everyday objects and activities with beauty, "for the love of art." This is the philosophy and motto of the privately supported Academy of Artisans, headed by partners vivacious and enthusiastic Daliah Organ, and the multi-talented Don Colvin.

The Academy offers courses to suit every talent: cooking & baking (taught by Daliah herself), sewing, serging, hand and machine knitting, tailoring and pattern drafting (taught by Don), painting and sculpture, jewellery, stained glass, pottery, papier mache, cartooning, soapstone carving, photography, embroidery, weaving, flower arranging, and many more. You are welcome to take more than one course. All 52 teachers are professional working artists; and all 6 well-equipped studios are stocked with the best materials.

Starting September 8, the Academy offers courses for the whole family, for all ages: preschool, child, teenage and adult. Class sizes are kept small, no more than 12, usually 8 or 9. There are weekend drop-in classes; and students are encouraged to socialize. For easy access, all classes are held under one roof, on one floor.

You'll find the Academy of Artisans at 490 Eglinton Avenue West, on the 2nd floor, 1 1/2 blocks west of Avenue Rd. There is parking at the rear. For information, course list flyer and for the love of art, call 322-9997 or fax 322-9662.

Learning For Life!

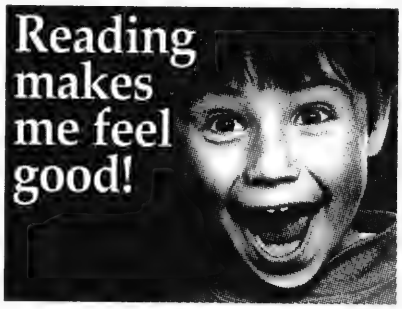
"Our job is to help spark a love of learning and provide children with simple, effective strategies that advance their confidence, understanding, performance and success. That's what Oxford Learning Centres are all about," explains Dr. Nick Whitehead, education researcher, author and founder of the company.

Oxford after-school programs teach essential skills such as how to learn and study more effectively. These skills are taught and applied through the teaching of the fundamentals of reading, writing, spelling and math. The objective is to help students develop independent, 'active' learning minds as well as to advance academic fundamentals.

Students begin with an assessment to uncover learning strengths and obstacles, academic levels and most importantly, potential. Oxford offers individualized programs, and curriculums based on Oxford research and unique cognitive-based learning methods. Homework support in all academic areas from Grade 1 through university is provided.

Oxford's unique Little Readers program introduces 3 to 6 year olds to phonics-based reading. It is a fun, fast-paced, half-day enrichment program that also builds fine motor and listening skills and includes activities in Math,French, Art and Music.

There are more than 25 Oxford Learning Centres operating throughout Ontario including Richmond Hill, Thornhill, North Toronto and North York.



Children discover the joy of learning! Using innovative learning materials developed by our own research teams, our students learn to read, write and spell using phonics. It's fun! It's creative! It works!

Up and Running on Your Computer

Parents everywhere would like to help their kids gear up for the new-age job market, but they face one small problem - kids already know more about computers than they do! In a world that's becoming more high tech every day, the majority of parents are worried they can't prepare their children for new jobs, a recent Decima Research poll shows. According to a recent Toronto Star article, "Canadians clearly understand what is required for their children's employment future, yet half of Canada's parents are concerned about adequately preparing their own children".

KEYBOARDERS provides the solution, two-fold:

1. KEYBOARDERS teaches children to type, using the proper 10-finger method and without looking at the keyboard. As we are all painfully aware, our children are told they'll lose marks if the teacher can't read their work or if it's messy, so naturally they want to hand in typed assignments. Unfortunately, the typing can be so frustrating that the entire assignment suffers, or a parent ends up finishing (or even starting) the job!
2. KEYBOARDERS teaches adults how to use the computer so that they can guide and help their school-age children into the technological age. With small, instructor-led classes, KEYBOARDERS offers total novices the opportunity to learn Microsoft Word, WordPerfect, Excel, Power Point, Access, AccPac and the Internet. Frustrated, intimidated, adults of all ages (the oldest graduate was 76) ease into the computer-age at KEYBOARDERS and generally become addicted!

KEYBOARDERS is located in Thornhill Square at Bayview and John Streets. Please call 905-731-4744 for more information.

Frightened by computers?
Frustrated by lack of typing skills?

New Classes Continuously Starting

Keyboarders will have you 'up and running' on WordPerfect, Microsoft Word, Excel, PowerPoint, AccPac and the Internet in less time than you can imagine! And, don't forget, we can teach you to type quickly and easily at KEYBOARDERS.

It has been a little over a year since popular Discovery School of Sport and Art opened its doors. It has quickly grown to become a multi-sport and dance centre for children of all ages. At Discovery you can find a little toddler learning front rolls to a college student-former gymnast, working out to keep in shape. Besides offering various classes in Artistic and Rhythmic Gymnastics, Trampoline, Karate, Ballet and Jazz, the Centre also holds birthday parties, seasonal camps, PD fun days and community activity events such as fundraisings gymathons, etc. Discovery's 10,000 sq. ft. modern gym is filled with Olympic standard gymnastic equipment for boys and girls with a separate section for kindergym classes. Rhythmic Gymnastics is offered through the Bathurst Jewish Centre. Discovery's competitive athletes have appeared on Rogers TV, at various competitions and community functions. The most recent event was Fitness 'n Fun day at Mel Lastman Square, where children could try out the multi-sports that Discovery offers. On Labour Day, Septemer 1st, Discovery students will once again perform at Mel Lastman Square during the Children's Festival.

Registrations for recreational and competitive classes are now being accepted at the Discovery Centre, 205 Champagne Dr., #5 (Finch & Dufferin). For more information please call: (416) 638-3033.

Organization helps to combat abuse of children

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Invest in Kids Foundation is a national organization working on behalf of Canadian children to ensure that they are raised free from harm and abuse, and have the opportunity to grow into competent and resilient adults.

Canadian children are at a greater risk today than ever before for psycho-social problems, says Dr. Paul Steinhauer, a child psychiatrist at the Hospital for Sick Children, a professor of psychiatry at the University of Toronto, and a member of the national Board of Professional Advisors of Invest in Kids Foundation.

Statistics are alarming. Forty percent of children come to school unfit to learn because of these problems. In Ontario, some 135,000 children witness violence at home annually, thus beginning a detrimental cycle. Many of these children become seriously aggressive themselves. Twenty-three percent of children are now considered seriously aggressive, and studies have found that more than 70 percent of these six-year-olds will grow up to become seriously aggressive adults.

"Obviously, there are serious human costs to allowing the abuse cycle to continue," says Judith Loeb Cohen, chair of Invest in Kids.

"But prevention of child abuse also makes financial sense – invest in kids today so they do not become a more costly burden on society in the future."

Founded in 1994, Invest in Kids Foundation was created to promote the health, development and well-being of children.

Karen Goldenberg, the recently appointed president of the foundation, says Invest in Kids focuses on children from birth to five years of age, "the most critical period in the development of the child and their parents."

The foundation raises funds to support and replicate proven early intervention and prevention programs in high risk areas across Canada and supports broad-based educational initiates in the area of child development.

Recently, the Ontario government provided a $10 million grant to the foundation.

Goldenberg explained that the grant will help the organization develop a province-wide program of professional training for frontline workers, ongoing research by those who work directly with infants, young children and their families, and public education and awareness programs.

The foundation's board of professional advisors has some of Canada's most prominent experts in the field of child health and development, including Dr. Freda Martin, executive director of Hincks Centre for Children's Mental Health, and Dr. Fraser Mustard, founder and past president of the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research.

Projects funded by Invest in Kids Foundation include Growing Together, which provides prevention and early intervention services for infants and young children who are most at risk and their families; the publication of a comprehensive book on healthy child development; an Internet Web site; and infant day care education advocacy journal for frontline child and health care workers; and an infant mental health promotion project for the Hospital for Sick Children.

"If the politicians say we can't afford to spend money on children today, just wait until they see the bill tomorrow," warns Steinhauer. "Prevention is always cheaper than treatment."

Support groups assist bipolar sufferers' families

TORONTO — The Department of Social Work and the Mood Disorders Clinic at The Clarke Institute of Psychiatry are offering support groups for partners and relatives of adults with depression or bipolar (manic-depression) disorders.

Families coping with a person who is diagnosed with depression or bipolar disorder face unique challenges and situations. Partners, parents and siblings struggle with providing emotional and practical support to their loved ones, in addition to dealing with their own daily stress.

The eight-week public support and education groups are open to any family member of a person diagnosed with depression or bipolar disorder.

Groups, which will run several tines a year, range in size from 10 to 15 participants and alternate between bipolar disorder and depression. Sessions are 90 minutes long.

The next session begins in October. For more information call 416-979-4747.

Slowing down antibiotic resistance

By JOHANNA SHEERIN

Antibiotics, discovered in the 1920s, are only effective against illnesses caused by bacteria. They were widely used to stop the spread of bacterial infections for the first time during World War II.

Diseases once considered deadly, such as pneumonia and tuberculosis, and more common ailments such as ear infections and sore throats all seemed to disappear with a dose of antibiotics. Soon North Americans expected the instant fix that antibiotics promised, and doctors readily gave their patients prescriptions.

Misuse of antibiotics over the years, however, has led to some bacteria becoming resistant. Recently, a Gallup poll revealed that while 50 percent of Canadians claim they are aware of the growing problem of resistance, 83 percent do not understand what resistance is or how it should influence their use of antibiotics.

If we are going to stop, or at the very least, slow down resistance to antibiotics, we need to reduce the annual intake of antibiotics in the population-at-large.

Patients and physicians need to develop new attitudes about antibiotics. Physicians need to re-evaluate when to prescribe antibiotics for patient use, and they need to be firm when their patients insist on antibiotics for an illness that won't be helped by antibiotics.

Patients must realize that they won't always walk away from their doctor's office with a prescription. They should understand that their physician is acting in their best interest by not prescribing antibiotics for an illness unless it is caused by a bacteria.

With school just around the corner, there is no doubt that your children will pick up germs leading to colds and flu.

Dr. Donald Low, microbiologist-in-chief, Mount Sinai Hospital/ Princess Margaret Hospital, joint department of microbiology says these steps can be taken to help minimize the misuse of antibiotics:

- Work in partnership with your family doctor. Ask if you or your child has a viral infection or a bacterial infection.
- If given a prescription for antibiotics, follow the directions closely. Many antibiotic treatments are only effective if the entire dosage is taken as prescribed — even when you are feeling better.
- Never give antibiotics — or drugs of any kind — to anyone else. Antibiotics are powerful drugs with side effects which vary from person to person. Some people have allergies which can be life threatening.
- Make sure your immunization record is up-to-date. Immunization is critical in the fight against viral and bacterial infections such as measles, polio, mumps, diphtheria and tetanus.
- Seniors, children and adolescents should receive certain immunizations, so check with your doctor.
- If you are treated in a hospital outside of Canada, particularly in the United States, let your doctor know. Antibiotic-resistant bacteria are endemic in most major American health institutions and are easily brought back home and spread by an unsuspecting traveller.

To Your Health is a regular monthly column prepared by a partnership of Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am on a diet to lose weight, and I am eating baked potatoes in place of french fries. How healthy are they and which type is the most flavorful?

A. Yukon Gold potatoes, which have almost a buttery taste, are often pegged as the best choice for flavor. Just like other potatoes, they are full of potassium, Vitamin B-6, Vitamin C and fibre.

Q. I enjoy watermelon in the summer. What is its calorie content?

A. Watermelon is a champion in the nutrient and low calorie department. One cup has a mere 51 fat free calories. As well, it contains one-quarter of your daily requirements of vitamin C and a splash of B-6, magnesium, thiamin and potassium.

Q. When baking, how can I reduce fat in the recipe?

A. You can substitute some ingredients for fat, but do not replace all the fat at once. Try substituting some, and if it still has the taste and texture of the original recipe then reduce some more the next time.

In place of cream try evaporated skim milk. Butter or margarine can be replaced with equal parts of applesauce and buttermilk, and butter or oil in chocolate desserts can be replaced by pureed prunes.

Q. What fruits and vegetables have iron?

A. Prune juice, dried dates, cooked prunes, cooked spinach, dried apricots and cooked broccoli are among the better plant sources of iron.

Exercise for real women

NEW YORK — Exercise. The word alone conjures images of fashion models and perfect aerobic bodies performing complicated workout routines to loud rap and disco. But most of us are neither models nor gymnasts.

The solution: Hadassah introduces an exercise video for real women. Because Hadassah knows that real women are all ages, all heights, all body weights and all fitness levels.

Get Movin' with Hadassah, led by a physiologist, features women in their 20s, 40s and 60s in warm-up, cardio, weight training and stretching routines. These women are not models or superstars. Each works according to her own ability, so viewers can follow along at their own pace.

Women of every shape and in every age group feel comfortable with this routine. The payoff: Beauty as a result of developing inner-confidence, energy, strength and feeling good — inside and out.

And never before has an exercise video geared its music to the Jewish audience. Get Movin' features traditional Jewish and Israeli folk music from the Real Complete Jewish Party Music Collection and modern interpretations of Jewish folk songs from the Israeli band Rebbe Soul.

Enhancing this fun and comprehensive workout, a companion book offers guidelines for a safe and healthy workout, disease-prevention tips and information about healthy living.

Exercise is not about looking young or looking beautiful, it's about caring for yourself. So forget about superstar legs. Think optimal health, think energy, think fun. Get Movin' With Hadassah makes it easy. Although created for its 300,000 members, this video is now available to the general public. For information about this and other Hadassah health programs, call 212-303-8094.

One-of-a-kind Jewish arts and crafts show at ASHKENartZ!

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — The visual arts are well represented at Ashkenaz: A Festival of New Yiddish Culture.

A large tent at York Quay will house the ASHKENartZ! Marketplace, a juried show and sale of Judaic art to be held Labor Day weekend. In addition, Dancing with the Leviathian, an exhibition of 38 North American Jewish artists exploring issues of cultural identity, is on at the Lonsdale Gallery, 33 Lonsdale Rd., as well as at York Quay and at the Community Galleries at Harbourfront. Ashkenaz has also commissioned four works at different sites.

Billed as "the most important juried Judaica show and sale ever assembled in Canada," ASHKENartZ! Marketplace opens the evening of Aug. 30. It is a-one-of-a-kind Jewish show featuring 30 exhibitors of Judaic arts and crafts, jewelry, books and music from Israel, Canada and the United States.

Michael Shapiro, coordinator of ASHKENartZ!, said he was interested in running a Judaica gallery similar to the one formerly operated by Dorion Liebgott, the curator of the museum at Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

Shapiro, who has considerable exposure to Judaica because of his experience in marketing custom ketubot, said he was looking for the right opportunity to expand his involvement in Judaic arts. He approached Ashkenaz organizers about mounting a show after hearing it was something they wanted to do, he said.

"In speaking with them, it was clear that we were a great fit. Ashkenaz was a perfect venue."

The vendors selected for ASHKENartZ! offer a wide range of art, from works in wood and ceramics to prints and paintings, he said. "They are all Jewishly rooted. It's a celebration of Jewish creativity in the context of the Ashkenaz festival."

Shapiro said there will be many items in the $20 to $50 range, as well as unique items priced at hundreds of dollars. He described the artists as ranging from emerging to established. Vendors include Michele Dodick, Edna Sandler Judaica, Bracha Designs and Tara Publications, which specializes in Jewish music.

Visitors will also be able to paint their own ceramic chanukiot and mezuzot at the booth of Marvelous Mess, a paint-your-own ceramics company.

"The exciting thing is that ASHKENartZ is happening," Shapiro said. "It's only on for three days. It won't be happening again until 1999."

Dancing with the Leviathian, on display at the Lonsdale Gallery until Sept. 7, and at the Harbourfront galleries until Oct. 13, showcases works in a wide variety of media, including paintings, photographs, sculptures and textiles.

Israeli film blends bizarre fantasy, stark reality

BY JOSEPH SERGE
Arts editor

Saint Clara is a film that successfully blends a bizarre fantasy world with stark realism.

Call it an Israeli Clockwork Orange.

The film takes place in and around Golda Meir, a junior high school in a fictitious industrial-immigrant town in Israel in 1999. Factories are constantly belching smoke and the evenings are always grey and damp.

Clara is a 13-year-old student who can see the future. Best friends Eddie and Rosy are two anarchist pill-popping classmates of hers who want to start a revolution.

Rosy (Johnny Peterson) has a violent mean streak in him and when he wonders around town swinging a baseball bat you can't help but compare him to A Clockwork Orange's Alex.

Rosy and Eddie (played by Israeli teen rock star Halil Elohev) coerce Clara to use her powers to determine what questions will be on a math test. They use the same power of persuasion to force Galit, the class brain, to write down all the answers and share them with the rest of the class prior to the test.

When math teacher Mounitz discovers that everybody in the class scored perfect on the test he and principal Tissona start an investigation that would make the CIA proud. Grilling each of the students individually, their methods and finger-pointing turn the students against each other including best friends Eddie and Rosy.

Saint Clara (Lucy Dubinchik) views the future in Israeli film

It doesn't help the two friends either that they both fall in love with Clara, a strikingly beautiful Russian immigrant, delightfully played by 14-year-old Lucy Dubinchik. And it doesn't help Clara's cause that her supernatural powers will cease the moment she falls in love.

The cast of characters, particularly the adults, are an eccentric lot, similar to those in the post-apocalyptic French film Delicatessen. Principal Tissona (Yigal Naor) has an unexplained fixation with anything French and convinces himself he slept with chanteuse Edith Piaf during her prime. Teacher Mounitz (Moshe Damidov) claims he beat chess master Bobby Fisher. Clara's family, survivors of a nuclear meltdown in the Crimea, spend their days watching nuclear holocaust programs on T.V.

You realize quickly it's the adults that live in a self-delusional fantasy world and not the teenagers.

Filmmakers Ari Folman and Ori Sivan did a wonderful job adapting the film from the novel by Czech dissident Pavel Kohout. They must also be commended for bringing out excellent acting from the cast of teenage, mostly inexperienced actors.

Saint Clara played numerous film festivals around the world and swept the film awards of Israel including Best Picture in 1996.

NFB documentary illuminates Mordecai Richler's life

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Apprenticeship of Mordecai Richler is one of those cinematic portraits which covers all the bases. It illuminates Richler's life as a wickedly satirical novelist, sheds light on his craft and addresses his Jewishness.

This National Film Board of Canada documentary, to be aired on the Bravo! channel on Aug. 28 at 8 a.m., is a well-rounded picture of a fearlessly iconoclastic writer who seeks respect rather than acceptance.

Alan Handel's 57-minute film, though made in 1986, does not feel dated. Based on archival footage, clips from the movies of his books (The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz and Joshua Then and Now) and contemporary interviews, it's as fresh as a morning breeze, and witty besides.

The enfant terrible of Canadian literature, Richler was born in Montreal in 1931, the son of observant East European Jews. It was not a happy household and Richler's parents were divorced when he was 13. He professes to have had tender feelings for his father, despite the lack of communication between them.

A graduate of the 1948 class of Baron Byng High School, Richler was a single-minded person. He rebelled against his family's Orthodox religious beliefs, and while his bourgeois peers aspired to be professionals or businessmen, he saw his future in writing.

With visions of F. Scott Fitzgerald and Ernest Hemingway dancing in his head, he left Montreal when he was 19, bound for Paris. He didn't stay long, proceeding to Spain before settling down in London, England, where he remained for 20 years.

His goal was to write an "important" book, but his first published novel, The Acrobats (1954), was far too derivative even for his tastes.

According to one of his oldest friends, Richler is remarkably disciplined. Not waiting for inspiration, he plunks himself down in front of a typewriter at exactly the same time each day and clacks out a torrent of words.

Writing, Richler observes, is a struggle. Nothing is more difficult. He is in competition with himself, and what sustains him is the quest to write a perfectly realized novel.

He considers himself a Jewish and a Canadian writer. But above all else, he wants to be known as a serious writer.

Richler has been criticized for his scathingly sarcastic portrayals of Montreal's Jewish community. But he is at peace with himself, claiming that his objective is to be an "honest witness."

Renowned for his flamboyant cast of characters, Richler, in person, is rather reticent, tight-lipped and awkward, particularly during television appearances. Yet he loosens up in the company of friends and drinking acquaintances. And he is absolutely devoted to his second wife, Florence, his "intellectual partner," who describes him as "strong, loyal and loving."

Ruth Wisse, an academic who has studied his work, contends that Richler has a "great deal of difficulty" with his Jewishness. Richler, while respectful of her scholastic credentials, counters that his novels are a "proclamation" of his Jewishness and that he is not "uncomfortable" with his Jewish heritage.

As a Richlerian retort, it's not entirely convincing.

PARCHMENT AUTHOR UP FOR JOURNEY PRIZE

Ottawa writer Gabriella Goliger, whose story Maladies Of The Inner Ear appeared in the 1996-97 issue of Parchment: the journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing, has been named as one of 12 finalists for this year's Journey Prize, worth $10,000.

Goliger's story will be included in the annual Journey Prize anthology of short stories. McClelland & Stewart, the Toronto-based publishing house that administers the prize, calls the perennial short-story collection "Canada's most popular fiction anthology." Author James Michener established the Journey Prize 10 years ago with the Canadian royalties from his 1988 novel Journey.

This is the second time Goliger has been included in the Journey Prize Anthology. Her story Song of Ascent was part of the collection in 1995. In addition to the $10,000 for the winning entry, another $2,000 supplied by McClelland & Stewart is bestowed upon the journal in which the winning entry first appeared.

The publisher intends to announce a short list of three finalists on Oct. 4 and announce the winner Oct. 22 at the opening of the Harbourfront International Festival of Authors in Toronto.

Ashkenaz Literary Line-up: Like the oil lamps of the ancient Maccabeans, the Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture (Aug. 25 to Sept. 1) shines for eight days after first being lit. Here are the festival's main literary events. Admission is free.

• One of the last great Yiddish writers, Chava Rosenfarb of Montreal gives a reading Aug. 31 at 7 p.m. in the Urban Square Tent. Sponsored by the Friends of Yiddish and the Workmen's Circle.

• Finf-Un-Tsen: Canadian Jewish Writers is a literary cabaret program featuring award-winning writers. On Aug. 31, 3 p.m. in the Urban Square Tent, hear Ronna Bloom, Adeena Karasick, Norman Ravvin, Libby Scheier, Jason Sherman, Rhea Tregebov, Eddy Yanofsky.

On Sept. 1, 2:30 p.m. in the Urban Square Tent, hear Matt Cohen, Ruth Mandel, Janis Rapoport, Veronica Ross, Emil Sher, Simcha Simchovitch.

Admission is also free to these lectures and forums:

• The Artist As Jew, the Jew As Artist. Four contemporary artists discuss their work in the Dancing with the Leviathan art exhibition, Aug. 27, 7 p.m., Water's Edge Cafe.

• Adventures in Yiddish. Author-humorist Michael Wex offers a lighthearted look at the Yiddish language. Aug. 28, 8 p.m. in the Water's Edge Cafe and Aug. 31, 4:30 p.m., Studio Theatre.

• Gypsies, Greeks and Klezmer Music: The Creation of the "Southern" Klezmer Repertoire in 19th-Century Moldavia. With Zev Feldman. Aug. 31, 3:30 p.m., Studio Theatre.

• Out of the Ashes. Various artists discuss how artists can bring an illuminating voice to Holocaust issues. Sept 1, 1 p.m., Urban Square Tent.

These two storytelling events are also free:

• Sheldon Oberman tells tales, Aug. 31 at 4:30 p.m. and Sept. 1 at noon in the Urban Square Tent.

• Leslie Robbins, tells The Whistling Carp and other tales. Aug. 31, 6 p.m., Community Gallery.

Filmmakers on Film: The CBC Museum is privately showing a series of tributes to filmmakers such as Atom Egoyan, John Huston, Leni Riefenstahl and Walt Disney in the Graham Spry Theatre of the CBC Building, 250 Front St. W., Toronto. Each show is scheduled for multiple screenings in September, and admission is free.

The series includes a documentary on Norman Jewison, from Adrienne Clarkson Presents in 1991, and Charles Wasserman's 30-minute interview with Riefenstahl from 1965. Each item is scheduled for multiple screenings. For times, phone the CBC Museum at 416-205-5574 or CBC Tours, 416-205-8605.

Family Saga: Vancouver author Cherie Smith combines biography, memoir and autobiography to trace four generations of her own immigrant family in Mendel's Children: A Family Chronicle, due from the University of Calgary Press in September.

The story begins in the shtetls of Poland and Latvia in the 1890s and follows the family of great-grandfather Mendel, a dairyman who sires five sons and four daughters. From such deeply mythologized beginnings worthy of Shalom Aleichem, the story moves with various family members to Western Canada – Winnipeg and Vancouver.

"Cherie Smith does not pretend to teach history, but no historian or general reader will doubt the authenticity of her portrayal of life in small Canadian towns,"said Haim Avni, an Israeli historian.

Epsteins add a third show

Due to popular demand, The Epstein Brothers "Kings of Klezmer" will do a third show at the Askhkenaz Festival on Aug.30, du Maurier Centre, 10:30 p.m.

Lawyer-turned-entertainer now on The Broccoli Tour

By CINDY WAXER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — "Law was my waitress job," says former lawyer turned singer/comedienne Tsufit, who performed recently at the Festival by the Lake in Tillsonburg, Ont.

"It's not that I didn't like being a lawyer, but I was always going to be a performer."

Whereas most struggling performers supplement their meagre incomes by serving burgers, Tsufit (Hebrew for hummingbird) was serving subpoenas as a litigation lawyer for nine years before she began performing full time.

Approximately a year and a half later, Tsufit has captivated audiences with her unique sense of humor at Yuk Yuk's, Mel Lastman Square Amphitheatre, the Elora Fringe Festival and most recently, the Barry Zukerman Amphitheatre in North York. As well, a recording of the concert she performed last summer at the Free Times Cafe has been released under the title of Broccoli's On Sale at Dominion, which is also the name of her upcoming series of concerts.

"I'm amazed at how quickly it's working because I know a lot of people spend years trying to make it, but I think the reason it's working is that it's not really one year. It's really the 20 years of background that I didn't even realize I was laying," she explains.

Born in Israel, Tsufit travelled in the United States with her family before settling in Kingston, Ont., when she was five years old.

Throughout the years working in law and raising a family, Tsufit has been performing, singing, doing comedy and writing her own original material.

The Broccoli Tour features a mixture of cleverly written songs, hilarious stand-up bits and touching ballads accompanied by acoustic guitar.

The title song parodies a Jewish mother's long distance telephone advice with startling accuracy. "My mother always calls me and tells me, 'Broccoli's on sale at Dominion so go buy some. Steam it, don't boil it because you'll lose all the vitamins,'" says Tsufit, mimicking the stereotypical Jewish mother's nasal voice.

The song Bagel Blues, written for the Ontario Renaissance Festival, looks at how difficult it must have been to find a decent bagel in 16th-century England.

Tsufit's stand-up comedy routines include Birthday Cheques, about putting the grandparents on a direct payment plan for the kids' birthday presents, and The Sport of Shopping, which describes a visit to the mall as a highly competitive Jewish sport.

Tempering The Broccoli Tour's intensely funny comedy routines and satirical songs are Hebrew melodies which reveal not only Tsufit's more serious side, but also her vocal talents.

"My favorite stuff to sing is Hebrew chassidic music," she says.

But whether Tsufit is performing stand-up comedy, singing the hilarious composition, Bagel Blues, or strumming the melody of a Hebrew song on her acoustic guitar, her humorous perspective on life offers something for everyone.

"I see what I do as Seinfeld set to music, because it's really everyday stuff that I focus on."

Perhaps Tsufit doesn't realize she can't buy broccoli at a dress store.

Tsufit will perform at the Free Times Cafe on Sept. 10. 320 College St., Toronto, (416-967-1078).

Ontario firm shortlisted in cross-Israel highway project

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A consortium led by a Mississauga, Ont. firm has beaten out some of the world's largest toll highway developers to reach the finals against one other consortium to construct the Cross-Israel Highway.

"We are very pleased to make the final round in what has been a tough competition among some of the leading toll highway builders in the world," Canadian Highways International Corporation (CHIC) president John Beck announced last Thursday.

Costing $1 billion it will be the largest transportation project in Israel's history, stretching 86-kilometres across almost the entire length of the country.

CHIC will use the expertise it developed during the construction of Highway 407 in Ontario to create Israel's first toll road.

"We have a balanced team with the experience in toll road development through public-private partnerships, construction, tolling technology and highway operations to provide the right mix for this project," Beck said.

CHIC was one of the participants on Canada's trade mission to Israel in February 1997, less than two months after the signing of the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement.

Beck, who was on that trip, told The CJN earlier this year that the trade mission gave the CHIC team important access to Israeli decision makers that would not normally have been possible.

Beck said the Israelis had heard about CHIC's work on Highway 407 while conducting a study on private sector toll roads and asked for a bid on the Cross-Israel Highway. At the height of the bidding, the Canadian-led consortium had 40 staff working in Israel.

Earlier this year, CHIC spokesperson Mitch Patten said that the emphasis of the proposal is on extensive Israeli corporate participation.

"What we are bringing is expertise," said Patten.

The CHIC consortium has been asked to elaborate on certain aspects of their original proposal, which is an encouraging sign.

CHIC's partners in the bid are Africa Israel Investment Ltd., Société Général d'Entreprises of France and Hughes Aircraft Systems International (the development company for the electronic tolling system).

The building of the Cross-Israel Highway is expected to relieve some of the congestion on Israeli highways. Israel is ranked among the most congested western countries, with over 80 vehicles per kilometre of road.

It also has one of the highest annual vehicle growth rates in the world (six to seven percent). Also important is the government's wish to promote easy commuting from smaller centres to Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. The Israeli government is expected to select a preferred bidder in November.

Testament to Alberta Jewry

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Eda Diamond and bridesmaids. C.1927.

TORONTO — An amazing compilation of photographs of bearded patriarchs and other early Jewish pioneers has been published under the title of Land of Promise, 1889-1945, by the Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta.

The 270-page coffee table book has more than 400 photographs that tell a fascinating story of the Jewish settlers who fled pogroms in Europe. There are pictures of their descendants at family celebrations. These people were forerunners of the thriving Jewish communities of Calgary, Lethbridge and Medicine Hat.

In a painstaking editing job, volunteers have supplied names to all the people in the photographs so it becomes a veritable treasure trove.

To name only a few of the families who who were among the pioneers, there are photographs of the Belzbergs, Belkins, Joffes, Shumiatchers, Diamonds, Bercusons, Sereths and Grobermans.

One of the volume's intriguing aspects is its depiction of Jewish life in the small Alberta villages, some of them strung along the railway line, of Czar, Daysland, Big Valley, Bow Valley, Canmore, Morrin, Irricana, Olds, Little Chicago, Trochu and Munson.

There are scenes of weddings, Purim celebrations, stags, early farm shots, including threshings, bar mitzvahs, frontier shop fronts, picnics, synagogue interiors and exteriors, piles of furs and hides, cattle and other farm animals and the interiors of Jewish-owned stores, whose owners have now moved away.

Harry Woolfe , a member of the Royal North West Mounted Police, is shown on his horse Nipper in 1916.

There is a photo of Mordechai and Rachel Leah Hanson. At age 60, Hanson, who homesteaded in the north, died of a heart attack while hauling barrels of water from a slough to fight a prairie fire.

The quality of reproduction is excellent. The book is a trip down memory lane for anyone interested in Canadian Jewish history.

Books look at golf from two different angles

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Lorne Rubenstein

TORONTO — Rhodesian-born Nick Price can lay claim to many golfing distinctions. He's won several majors, taken the Canadian Open and is one of the most recognizable golfers on the pro circuit. A real golfer's golfer, it turns out he's also a duffer's golfer.

Before vaulting into the rarified stratosphere of golfing's elite, Price paid his dues, recording plenty of mediocre seasons while relying on a klutzy swing only a mother could love. It cost him in those early tour years in the 1980s, when in key situations, he'd find himself in the rough as often as in the middle of the fairway. But through hard work and perseverance and by getting to understand his swing, he turned his game around.

A believer in the importance of technique and repetition, Price has put down in black and white the fundamentals that go into developing consistency on the golf course. His book, The Swing; Mastering the Principles of the Game (Random House), is co-written with Lorne Rubenstein, the Globe & Mail's golf reporter.

The book is a soup to nuts examination of the technical elements that make for a good golf swing, including everything from the grip and set-up to backswing and downswing.

Price, who struggled with an erratic swing for years, is a firm believer that your game will never come around until you develop consistency and good technical habits. Moreover, it's never too late to drop bad habits and develop into a good — if not tournament-winning — golfer.

Rubenstein, who's known Price since he first started on the PGA tour, says Price "wanted to write a book that told a golfer he or she could improve over time."

Patience, practising the fundamentals and taking a long-term view are Price's keys to improving one's game, Rubenstein said. You have to build up muscle memory so that hitting well becomes almost instinctive on the course. And you have to understand why you hit a great shot or missed an easy one.

"If you don't know why you hit well, you can't repeat it," Rubenstein said.

Price, who's as courteous and personable as his reputation, committed himself to improving his game over time and he believes any golfer can do the same, Rubenstein said. "The book is not written for people who believe they can improve over night."

A somewhat different approach to the game of golf was penned by local golf aficionado Jonathan Fine. Titled Golf is a Very Simple Game: The Golf Teachings of the Late Senor Francisco Lopez, (Stand Tall International), the book focuses on the mental aspects of the game.

Lopez, who served as a pro at the Oakdale Golf Club, "instilled in me a passion for golf," said Fine, who practises law when he isn't whacking balls.

Fine and Lopez became friends over the years but eventually lost touch. One day, almost out of the blue, Fine received a call from Lopez. His former golf mentor told Fine he had only about two weeks to live. Lopez wanted Fine to record his approach to golf.

It was to "stand tall, proud like a matador," Fine said.

Fine believes that by adopting Lopez' mental approach to the game, he shaved six strokes off his handicap and was able to win a club championship.

"The more experience you have, the more you can draw from the book," he says.

Golfers must not let poor shots distract them. They must think ahead to the next shot, relax and play fluidly, Fine said.

Lopez stressed the power of positive thinking and the book is true to that vision, Fine said.

Tournament dedicated to lawyer

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Heavy skies did not deter participants on the first day of the recent seventh annual Baycrest Open golf tournament.

More than 300 golfers turned up over the two-day event to partake in this popular fundraiser for the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The tournament, organized by Baycrest's Leadership Development group, which is comprised of professionals and community-minded people between the ages of 25 and 40, took place recently at the Glen Eagle Golf Club in Bolton.

The tournament was dedicated to the memory of 37-year-old lawyer David Wolfish, a key Baycrest Open Committee member, who died earlier this year.

"David was an active committee member who devoted his time and energy year after year to both the organizational and fundraising aspects of the tournament," said Baycrest Open committee co-chair Paul Lindzon.

The tournament was originally conceived as an event for younger players. "There were very few charity golf tournaments. This one was the first to target people who fit the age range of the Leadership Development group," said Neil Goldenberg, the founding co-chair of the event. Today, participants span a cross-section of ages and include many father-and-son teams.

The Baycrest Open has grown to become one of the largest and most successful charity golf tournaments in North America. It generally raises an average of $80,000 a year for Baycrest and has become a model for other golf fundraisers in Toronto, Goldenberg noted.

Golfers play a best-ball-scramble format, the most common game for charity tournaments. Teams of four tee-off and see which person has made the best hit. Then they all move their balls to that position and take their next shot from there.

On the first day, teams were only able to play nine holes because of the rain, but on the second day, golfers got in a complete game. Top scorers finished at 13 under par. Festivities afterward included a live auction and a banquet.

מאת: יעל זליגר

דבק שקדים או ציאניד, מאת: רקפת זהר, זמורה ביתן, 1995.

About families

Dear Susan,

I have been separated for two months following the dissolution of a marriage of 20 years. My husband and I have worked hard to orchestrate a smooth separation. As we prepare for the High Holy Days, we are anxious to provide our children, ages 15 and nine, with as pleasant an experience as possible. Do you have any helpful hints?

Dear Reader,

Your husband and you should be congratulated for endeavoring to effect a smooth separation. Your children can only benefit from your careful management of the profound change in their world.

I would encourage you to pay close attention to the details of everyday life, and the effect your separation will have on your children insofar as those details are concerned. You both seem acutely concerned with your children's feelings and interests. This implies that you have empathy for your children and that you are sensitive to their needs and desires. You are right in concerning yourself with the coming High Holy Days, as this is the first major event that you will face since you and your husband have separated.

You and your husband may consider discussing a possible plan. Since your children are older, you may want to solicit their input as to what they would like to do. You should acknowledge that this is the first Jewish New Year you are celebrating post separation, and as such they will likely be subject to a variety of feelings. Once they express their feelings, you may want to explore various options.

Children need continuity at any age. They may wish to continue to celebrate in the fashion they always have or they may wish to create a new mode of celebration. The children will benefit from your placing their needs above your own. You will be modeling an option that says that parents can get along even if they are no longer together.
